"One thing was certain, that... it was the black kitten’s fault entirely."

Worsted in the Shadows

While traveling through Hope, the city ruled by the temperamental Queen of Hearts and capitol of her monarchy, the party finds itself in a less savory neighborhood - the club cards scarcely ever patrol here, and life (and treacle) is cheap. Allow the PCs a Notice roll; with a success they hear footfalls, but there is nobody to be found in the shadows. On a failure, a shadowy figure garrotes the hind-most party-member with a loop of yarn round the neck while another grabs the feet out from under the victim. The victim suffers 2d6 damage, and the attackers have the Drop on them. If a NPC is the victim it is killed outright - play up the barely audible choking and the desperate flailing before the onset of death.

Lethal or not, the attackers leave three horizontal scratches across both cheeks of the victim and disappear into the shadows. If the party kills the attacker(s), they find them to be hooded and cloaked Cat Anthrops with the shape of a black kitten dyed into the fur above their heart. A Knowledge (Wonderland) roll reveals that the emblem or the scratches are hallmarks of The Black Kitten, a death-cult thought eradicated decades ago. Any Priest of Alice will know that The Black Kitten is also mentioned in "The Looking Glass Gospel according to Carroll" as a demonic figure - no roll required.

Investigation

If the PCs go to the authorities, they find them unsympathetic and overworked. Nobody important gets killed in these "worstings"; so it's not worth the 6 of Clubs' time to investigate. A Streetwise roll discovers where other attacks occurred, and a raise on a Persuasion roll finds someone willing to talk about it. There have been four worstings this month in this area, one every third night. Old wives' tales give rumors of something terrible when the seventh victim is Worsted. The party’s informant is terrified for his life.

If the Avatar is defeated, the Queen of Hearts herself honors the heroes with a royal audience. She will of course arrest them for treason given any reason, rational or not, to suspect them.

If the Avatar is not defeated, it and its cult grow in power, strangling countless more innocents till the next new moon, when the Avatar carves a path of destruction eastward to the mountains. This has profound repercussions when this adventure is run as part of the Wonderland No More campaign.

"Oh, you wicked little thing!" cried Alice.
