AD&D THIEVES SPECIAL
For Guildmasters – Banditry Inc
For Adventurers – Castle in the Air
For Apprentices – How to Make Crime Pay
Mayhem and anarchy were just two of the less esoteric ingredients used to brew the latest Spring 86 Citadel Journal. In fact, this brand new issue of our popular magazine is easily the most mind-wrenchingly potent piece of publishing ever to escape from a lead-lined coffin. I can’t tell you the secret of creating such awesome power (this information is securely locked away in the Citadel Publication Crypt), but I can give you some hint of the soul-blasting and utterly abhuman results ....

A new selection of models featuring popular codes and a few surprises including fighters, undead, chaos ratmen, minotaurs, halflings, chaos dwarfs, slann, Judge Dredd and more. All new Citadel codes now feature extensive Warhammer descriptions and statistics with any special rules that apply.

The Vengeance of the Lichemaster - a Warhammer battle that can be played on its own or as an add-on to the latest Warhammer supplement The Terror of the Lichemaster. The vengeful necromancer Heinrich Komler descends upon the monastic recluses of his enemy and rival magician Bagrian Master of La Maisontaal. However, unknown to the Lichemaster, Bagrian is already in deep trouble, for his monastery is under attack from other foes, the dreaded Skaven - chaos ratmen from the city of Skavenblight. This three-cornered game features descriptions for the GM and players, separate brief sheets for each player and complete Warhammer stats for all characters involved. The monastery of La Maisontaal and centrepiece of the battle is provided as a specially designed card model.

The Skaven - a feature-length article on Citadel’s new chaos ratmen with a complete description of their different clans, special weapons and thoroughly unpleasant habits. Complete Warhammer stats and special rules are given, together with extensive rules on the use of associated magic.

Kaleb Daark continues his bloody quest in a further installment of our incredible chaotic comic feature. Kaleb Daark, chaotic champion of the Renegade God Malak, is driven to the aid of the endangered goddess Arianka.

Citadel’s latest plastic models are an inexpensive alternative to metal, especially suitable for forming large regiments for tabletop battles. We reveal a new plastic model, plans for further additions and tips on assembly and converting.

All the usual features including splendid colour and black-and-white artwork, more photos of new models, yet another competition and more!

Citadel's Spring Journal will be available at your local retailer from 12th April. In case of difficulty contact:

here has been a great deal of discussion in the Letters page about departments in White Dwarf. More observant readers will undoubtedly have noticed the unannounced demise of regulars such as Starbase, Heroes & Villains, Crawling Chaos, RuneRites, and now Fiend Factory. In the early days of White Dwarf, when there were only a few role-playing games, having a department tied to each game made sense. With the greater variety of popular games on the market, having a department for each is impractical, and indeed restricts the content of the magazine. White Dwarf must move with the Times (although we're moving to Nottingham rather than Wapping!).

Meanwhile, here is the first of many 'theme' issues, covering that most maltreated of all character classes, the thief. I think you'll find it up to our usual, quite remarkable, standards.

RIDDLE OF THE RING
Boardgame
Iron Crown Enterprises £19.95

Riddle of the Ring is a boardgame in which the actions, options and play of the game are entirely driven by card-draw and card-play. The six part jig-map covers Middle-earth in reasonable detail - not always completely accurate - detail. You will find most of what you seek but the map has been slightly deformed to fit the board. The artwork is undemanding but pleasant. Players represent Hobbits or Dark Riders, who move around the map looking for the Ring. Once found the Ring is carried off towards the Cracks of Mordor; en route other players may attempt to ambush, defeat, or rob the Ringbearer. What they can or cannot do depends on their cards.

The cards in Riddle of the Ring have a major advantage over standard rules sets that one has the instructions necessary for the use of that card on the card. Novices can play much more confidently without searching through the rules. The cards are also very attractive and allow a much higher quality of artwork than would counters. The cards come in a wide range of types. Travel cards may be played to boost movement (which is otherwise die-generated). More importantly they allow the player to move, do something, and then play by card move again. Travel cards include horses, boats, eagles and ropes (for movement) and may mean death for all. Gulp! A Card or cannot reply or five have been laid by them before play comes to a standstill.

There are over 600 paragraphs, some of which are quite lengthy. Wendigo is also written in a style likely to enhance enjoyment. Besides the skill rolls, there are numerous paragraphed possibilities which add even more unpredictability to a scenario that can seem too random at times. The adventure is very tough, and one game can be totally different from the next (although there are certain essential elements), so this is one solo that can be played over and over again. The possibilities are not easily exhausted, and it is a real challenge trying to succeed. On my first expedition, the path was finished off in just over a day, leaving me to stagger back to Fort McKenzie, the nearest habitation, where I was locked up for murder by the authorities.

E.R.E.C.H & THE PATHS OF THE DEAD
RPG Scenario (CoC)
Chaosium £9.75

None of H P Lovecraft's tales about the investigation of the Cthulhu mythos centred on a group of characters: the hero is totally alone on his slide into madness and death. It is only natural, therefore, that Call of Cthulhu should have a few solo adventures. Alone Against The Wendigo is the first, and although a small team of NPCs accompany the main character, it is still a solo effort. None of the other party members have any bent towards Cthulhu Mythos after each paragraph can break the action up, spoiling the atmosphere. Indeed, I have been so enthralled by the story at times that I have progressed at quite a rate, forgetting HM completely! The solo format works well for Call of Cthulhu, and I know that another such adventure is soon to be released. With a bit of luck, it won't be the last.

None of the characters has any statistics. This is where the similarities end. Chaosium have also provided a system of numbers that tell you where you have come from (in case you lose or wish to follow 'that trail'). The following sets sequences for use in the instance of Indefinite or Permanent Insanity. Each passage adds a certain number of points to Hannah Mythos (a unique skill that will measure how successful you were in the adventure; it can go over 100%), and less frequently Cthulhu Mythos.

There are paragraphs that allow you to rest and heal. The four non-player characters are totally skilled, and you can roll against their skills instead of Nadelmann's if you wish. These skill rolls are common, and since Nadelmann can't be good at everything this is an advantage.

set for the 17th century TA like much of the rest of the ICE Middle-earth material, and if you have seen any other module you will be instantly familiar with the layout of this one.

But you don't have to be a Middle-earth fan to pick up this module. It is very useful as a general fantasy roleplaying aid - for example, in the description of the Daen Coentis (ancestors of the Dunlendings), a human sub-culture which could be slotted into any world to give instant depth and background. The module also covers undead types in depth and many 'sites of interest' which any game could use. I have moved the excellently-planned fortress of Morthond several hundred miles north near Mirkwood in my own Middle-earth campaign, and plan to do the same with the surrounding town that is also detailed.

Although the whole module is very well laid out, neat, accessible and suitably illustrated, it is not perfect. As a number of other ICE modules, it gets carried away in one area - here it is the Paths of the Dead section (which is nothing more than a collection of tunnels beset with traps and monsters). In Southern Mirkwood they did the same thing with Dol Guldur and in Bree & the Barrow-Downs it was the proliferation of barrows. Not only is it a thorn in the author's right mind that would walk the Paths of the Dead or visit Dol Guldur, but why bother with pages of details? I find the notes on cultures, natural history, etc, a lot more interesting. Complexity: 8; Usefulness: 9; Skill: 8; Value: 7; Production: 9; Overall: 9.

SEND IN THE CLONES
RPG Scenario (Paranoia)
West End Games
£6.95

Send in the Clones is the latest Paranoia adventure, and involves the troubleshooters with Teela-O-MLY (pronounced 'Teela O'Mally'), the media goddess of the alpha Complex. Unfortunately goddesses sometimes have feet of clay, and Teela is certainly no exception. Unlike previous adventures it's designed for a party of troubleshooters of mixed security levels, from red to yellow, and definitely proves that a high security clearance isn't a recipe for a long and happy life.

As usual the adventure splits into three main phases: a prolonged hunt for someone who is manipulating The Computer's public-address channels to transmit subversive propaganda (those channels tend to get manipulated a lot!), a desperate struggle with the coils and folds of the complex's reorganised and intensely convoluted bureaucracy, and a trek through the dead capital of the complex, sector NBD.

Clones is full of jokes - some a little obscure for English readers - and introduces the most obnoxiously funny robot in history, a chance to appear on one of the complex's most popular TV game shows (accompanied by a tactical board game for the inevitable battle phases), two secret societies (one worshipping Pepsi-Cola, and the incredible secret of Teela's popularity. As usual it builds into a no-win situation for the players, and their inevitable execution or assignment to crowd work on war videos (for example, as cannon fodder in a video shot with live ammunition) comes as a fitting end to the adventure. At 48 pages with a cover screen it's as long as the classic Yellow Clearance Black Box Blues, but not quite as fun and slightly less coherent. Too many of the situations are obviously contrived jokes, rather than logical (if absurd) results of previous actions.

LANKHMAR - CITY OF ADVENTURE
RPG Scenario/Supplement (AD&D)
TSR Inc
£8.95

Lankhmar consists of a 96-page book with a back cover pocket containing a poster-size, full-colour map of the city, and a 32-page booklet of record sheets and player handouts. The main book starts with summaries of the Fafhrd and the Grey Mouser stories, with comments on their potential for adventures. While there is no substitute for reading the stories for yourself, this section is helpful for refreshing the memory and developing ideas. Then follows a district-by-district breakdown of the city, with detailed maps marking and describing 99 locations, and record sheets for your own campaign notes; this only scratches the surface of the city's potential.

Another map shows the wider world of Nehwon (with notes). Next comes a section of nearly 100 NPCs. Our two heroes are covered in full Legends & Lore format, with a few adjustments which bring them closer to the stories. The gods and monsters of Nehwon are also covered, with copious additions to those in Legends & Lore.

Next, the workings of the city are described, with political factions, guilds and religions lovingly detailed, and a chapter on adventuring in Lankhmar introduces us to the niceties of haggling, bribery, the legal system, and the all-important Social Levels, something which makes a valuable addition to the AD&D game rules. A section on generating new non-player characters and buildings includes sample building plans which are useful in any context - Lankhmar or otherwise.

My one initial worry was whether the AD&D game system could fit a pre-existing, detailed fictional setting without the obvious strain that showed in the Conan AD&D modules, but chapter 9 put my mind at rest with a series of conversion rules. There is a little spanner-work necessary, especially with spellcasters, but the adjustments work surprisingly well once you get used to them, and little or none of the flavour of the original setting is lost. Given that Lankhmar is an entire campaign setting, and not just another AD&D module, the adjustments are forgivable and indeed necessary.

Finally, there is a series of set-piece encounters to provide random incidents or starting-points for adventures. And 'The Karvian Elephant', a 9th-12th level scenario - I would have preferred something a little lower to start a campaign with.

The colour map is a thing of beauty, and has a number of grey areas literally - which the DM can design for himself/herself or fill in with the series of city-block geomorphs from the booklet, which also contains record sheets, duplicate maps and other information for players.

All in all, Lankhmar is a delight - I was convinced it would need a separate game, but I was wrong. If you like the stories - whether or not you play AD&D - you should get it as an encyclopedia and a work of fan literature. If you play AD&D - whether or not you like Leiber's stories - Lankhmar is simply the best city module ever to see print - including Thieves' World. D&D DMs will also find it useful, although a small amount of conversion is necessary. Rush out and buy this one - it's a beauty.

THE LORDS OF DESTINY
£6.95

RPG Scenarios (Dr Who)
FASA

What's the most important feature of a Dr Who story? Yes, you're right - it's still silly! Well, as you'll have noticed, FASA are close, but not quite there. Still, the contents of these scenarios are very accurate simulations of the kind of stories that have made Dr Who a popular TV regular for over 20 years. Each of the single book scenarios is laid out in the same format used in the rolegame, and the artwork is just as variable.
The Lords of Destiny simulates a war game-style "phased movement" system, with characters acting as often within a twelve-second turn as their speed characteristic dictates, and chances to hit dictated by a 36-sided die very likely upset by whom, and will anybody get to say, 'No, no, not the Mind-Propel?'

This scenario encourages imaginative refereeing, and plenty of characterisation, but lacks the period atmosphere of The Lytean Menace — it's just another 'spaceship puts the Universe at risk, aw, golly gosh!' story. There's the same depth of information in each of the 48-page booklets — it's just that we have a headstart in knowledge about Victorian England already.

Both scenarios contain a set of pre-generated characters ready for use — and The Lytean Menace is designed as a means of introducing a (Victorian) character to the TARDIS crew. If you've bought the Dr Who game, these scenarios would be a sound investment as first adventures to get your campaign going. Let's hope FASA keep up the quality.

FANTASY HERO Role-Playing Game Hero Games £13.95

Hero Games are best known as the creators of the Champions Superhero game system, which has already been joined on the market by their "modern-day" and "30's pulp" products, Danger International (AKA Espionage) and Justice Inc. Only now has the company chosen to attempt the 'big sword and sorcery' field with Fantasy Hero; the results are very interesting.

As before, Hero have decided to base their new game on the system first introduced in Champions. One break with Hero tradition is that the game is presented as a single, unboxed, 160-page, soft-backed book (with, one hopes, good binding), with tolerable illustrations and no index (but a reasonable table of contents and solidly logical presentation). The 'Hero System' is most noted for its flexibility and in that no dice are used in character creation. Instead, characters start with personal characteristics marginally above the average peasant, and a number (in this case 75) of 'Character Points', which may be spent to improve characteristics, obtain skills, or (in this game) to have use of magic spells or extra starting cash. Extra points can be obtained by accepting personal disadvantages such as odd looks, character quirks, dependant friends and suchlike. Thus a new character can be more or less exactly what the player wants to play, and players are encouraged to produce well-rounded characters with failings as well as strengths. The problem with this approach is that the system may be exploited by ingenious players, but a competent game master can usually restrain the worst excesses.

Skills in Fantasy Hero come from a reasonable list that should cover most fantasy situations (if in doubt, any new 'professional' skill can be invented), and are resolved by rolling a given number (usually linked to one characteristic or another) on 3d6 (the game only uses six-sided dice); the exception are a few combat skills and suchlike, which simply increase the options open to a character in battle. The only striking omissions are martial arts and serious acrobatics (both covered in Champions), which is a little rough on oriental monk-type characters. Hero Games characteristics often seem numerous at first glance, but each actually has a well-defined meaning and application; there is a link between some 'primary' and 'secondary' characteristics which can be important in character development.

Magic is the area in which Fantasy Hero is the most interesting. Spells can only be cast by those with Magic skill, and are learned by use of the Spell Research skill or study with other characters — either way, rules are required if experience must be spent to achieve the knowledge required. Each spell is built much like a Champions superpower; one or more 'Effects' are selected, and then various 'Advantages' can be applied to bring the result more into line with the creator's initial conception. Finally, a points cost is calculated for the spell, and paid by the user. An unmodified spell takes one 'phase', i.e. one action turn to cast, with the caster making himself easier to hit than usual, and a skill roll is necessary, but all of this can be changed by advantages or disadvantages; suffice to say that a wizard who makes all his spells lengthy, difficult, expensive and dangerous to cast can produce more spectacular results than his faster colleague.

Combat uses Hero 's wargame-style 'phased movement' system, with characters acting as often within a twelve-second turn as their speed characteristic dictates, and chances to hit dictated by a 36-sided die very likely upset by whom, and will anybody get to say, 'No, no, not the Mind-Propel?'

Characters receive a wide choice of manoeuvres, allowing some showy fencing (and crude brawling); experienced Champions players should check the differences from the older system. Shields reduce chances to hit, but armour absorbs damage; a moderately vicious encumbrance system should deter overmuch use of armour (especially by faster characters and, with, I expect, most spellcasters), while an optional hit location system adds realism, and rather super heroic 'presence attacks' allow victims to be browbeaten into surrender! The rules are rounded off with some good straightforward advice on play, which emphasises the idea that the GM determines much of the detail of the campaign; thus the 'sourcebook' of monsters, equipment, etc., is advisory only (if good), and the adventures (a stereotyped inn, a simple solo hunt, and a fairly predictable quest) might need modification. However, they make up a good complete set of rules.

This is not a game for the lazy. Creation of a spell-using character (or monster) can mean the creation of a whole book of spells, and the options available to player and GM are huge. Furthermore, there are a few misprints and inconsistencies (especially in the magic item creation rules). Nonetheless, for those who want flexibility, high colour and playability, it's probably the best thing on the market.

OPENBOX

The Lytean Menace, my favourite of the two, is set in London in 1885, and is attractively illustrated with period woodcuts that enhance the carefully created Victorian atmosphere. Without giving too much away, the plot involves the mysterious arrival in London of some anachronistic technology. It is the player characters' job to discover the source of this equipment, and ensure that the Time Stream isn't seriously disrupted. The plot is challenging, but not too intricate, and manages to interweave a healthy dose of Robert Louis Steven-son into the proceedings quite adroitly. In style, then, this is an interactive, investigative adventure. Gamers of the Rambo 'shoot-em-up' style of role-

The Lords of Destiny requires similar abilities, but is perhaps more likely to spawn a firefight. It is set aboard an enormous (and I mean enormous! — try 10,000 km long!) World-Ship which is whizzing through space at near-light speed, crunching planets as it goes. Its inhabitants aren't aware of the outside Universe, thanks to Supreme — the mega-computer which runs the whole ship. Meanwhile, a gang of rebels are fighting against the oppressive regime of the Captain-Lords, Supreme's lackeys. The adventure is plotted loosely but comprehensively, so that the possibilities are vast for the kind of plot twists which characterise the TV series. Will the player characters join the rebels, side with the Captain-Lords or remain unaligned? Who will be captured by whom, and will anybody get to say, 'No, no, not the Mind-Propel?'

This scenario encourages imaginative refereeing, and plenty of characterisation, but lacks the period atmosphere of The Lytean Menace — it's just another 'spaceship puts the Universe at risk, aw, golly gosh!' story. There's the same depth of information in each of the 48-page booklets — it's just that we have a headstart in knowledge about Victorian England already.

Critical Mass

According to American legend, SF is 60 this year. In 1991, presumably, it can start drawing a pension... thanks to Hugo Gernsback's Amazing Stories, whose 1926 launch marks Year One for US fans and immortalized 'Hugo' as the name of a Freudian-shaped rocket trophy. Where this leaves prehistoric SF authors like Mary Shelley, H G Wells or Jules Verne is unclear: in SF, America rules by right of numbers. Of this month's books, 78% are from across the Atlantic, the rest being American simulations. Don't die, but don't be triffid, either. William Gibson swept the awards with his first novel Neuromancer, a tale of next-century cyber-pirate whose pace and excitement hook into your nervous system and fribble you down like the killer programs he describes. The follow-up is Count Zero (Gollancz 269pp £9.95), set a few years later in Gibson's glittering, sleazy future. The events of Neuromancer are halfforgotten: organic 'biosoftware' is the rising new star. The cyberspace of the world data network, where Neuromancer's action peaked, has changed: not only are defences more tightly plotted against, while devising its scope and feel of connecting the two plains are roamed by giant killer pretzels, though I wonder whether Silverberg in 'black ice' nastier than ever, but the net is haunted by unknown presences.

Gibson spins a taut triple narrative: an industrial-warfare mercenary trying to spring the inventor of 'biochips' from his corporate employers, a nicely drawn art expert tracing works of anonymous brilliance, and a finicky monster-evil villain. There is even a Flemingesque monster-villain and a generous dose of streetwise voodoo. Has a girl with a headful of biochips become an avatar of voodoo's Eruzlie? Are the 'presences' only free artificial intelligences like that of Neuromancer? Decide for yourself as the name Count Zero shifts meaning in a chilling cyberspace climax. This may not have the impact of Neuromancer's first win dow on Gibson's future, but it's a far better novel.

Robert Heinlein makes another comeback with The Cat Who Walks Through Walls (NEL 374pp £9.95), starting well with violence and flight. The hero, being a Heinlein hero, pauses to marry his current lady friend before running—from an L5 colony, in a wonky spacecraft, to an unbelievable but funny forced landing, whence in several stages across a Moon which proves to be that of The Moon is a Harsh Mistress, 112 years on—and finally, on page 230, after his mildly entertaining escape, he would have served a younger Heinlein for half a chapter, we get some plot.

Oh dear. I'm afraid it's Heinlein self-indulgence time again. What's on the menu is those blasted inter-universal travellers from Number of the Beast, plus walk-ons from Time Enough for Love, Glory Road, The Moon is a Harsh Mistress, Stranger in a Strange Land and more. All lapses into introductions, logorrhea and cuteness: a lunch into several pages of dramatic finale (carefully unresolved) can't save the book. I was hoping to like it, too. Even after a merry exchange in which some of the characters are treated with unreserved contempt for thinking it wrong that people should die if they can't pay air charges on the Moon—the other—rather than argue against it, Heinlein reveals this wickedly socialistic person to be a traitor and spy. This is know as loading the argument...

The Memory of Wind (Macdonald 351pp £9.95) is the third novel by another young American, Kim Stanley Robinson, who definitely oozes talent. Confession time: the book is about music and I'm tone-deaf, so I may find it less riveting than you. I also note that the book appear long over its 239pp, and it looks out in an itchy rash when addressed as 'dear Reader', which Robinson does constant. That said, this is impressive for its scope and feel of connecting the two cultures: both music and multidimensional physics sound convincing. Johannes Wright is making a Grand Tour of the Solar System in 3229, from Pluto to Saturn, to the Sun, perfoming on the bizarre one-man 'Orchestra' devised way back by physicist Holickywelkin, whose unified field theory led to systemwide colonization. Wright is being mysteriously plotted against, while devising an ultimate 'music of the spheres' incorporating Holickywelkin's equations (remember Charles Harness's The Rose)? The philosophical implications naturally prove to be stupendous. A few pretensions could do with trimming, but it's a worthy effort....

Philip K Dick's 1972 We Can Build You (Grafton 252pp £2.50) appears here for the first time. Though not one of his best, it has an uneasy power. The expected plot focus is the building of ultra-life-like historical simulacra, eg Abraham Lincoln (who proves a sympathetic character), which is crowded offstage by the narrator's destructive obsession with the schizophrenic girl who designs the machines. Dick's other human—little people against the world—is here, but overall it's a dark book. Behind the (irrelevant) robot Hitler on the cover, Chris Foss has painted a robot Philip K Dick called Eric.

Eric Frank Russell is our odd one out. He was British, but cultivated a wise-cracking transatlantic style for the US market, as more recently did John Brunner, Stinister Barrier (Methuen 21pp £2.50) is a historical curiosity from 1939, SF based on Charles Fort's offbeat speculations. 'I think we're property,' said Fort. Russell translated this into nasty energy beings who hang from telepathic walls, and chronicled the results when the facts leak out. Painfully dated, but a must for the collector's library. Eighteen years later, Russell had improved his technique no end. His follow-up (Methuen 175pp £2.50), a much-loved story of perverse warfare. 'By scrwaling suitable words on a wall, the right man in the right place at the right time might immobilize an armoured division.' James Mowry is fitted to the eyeballs with sabotage techniques and, in a favourite Russell gambit, dumped on an enemy planet to subdue it single-handed. Fast and funny—no less so than Granada's definitive editions, which like Dobson's hardback gained much from Russell's later (1958) revisions.

Robert Silverberg's Sunrise on Mercury (Pan 176pp £1.95) comprises thirteen stories dated 1954 to 1979. All are exceedingly slick and competent, though I wonder whether Silverberg in 1996 feels twinges of guilt about his pat ronizing attitude towards the alien back in the 50s. The whole book goes down smoothly and tastes pretty good throughout. Half an hour later you'll be hungry again.

The best thing about National Lampoon's DOON (Grafton £2.50 176pp) is Bruce Pennington's cover, a lovely send-up of his paintings for the NEL Dune series. (Goodness knows what made NEL switch to the far less evocative artist who now disfigures the books.) Inside, author Ellis Weiner does a cut-rate version of the famous Bored of the Rings treatment: get in this time with as many jokes as possible (25% of them incomprehensibly American). The idea of DOON, the Dessert Planet, whose plains are roamed by giant killer pretzels, their galaxy's parliament—bending liquid beer... that's funny. There are good pokes at Herbert's pre tensions: the elliptical quotations, the weird words and glossaries, the conversations in which neither party ever gets to the point (but think a lot, in italics). But with the best will in the world, a parody of a particular author gets tired some after a few thousand words. [You mean like this clever Langford parody you're doing?—Ed.]

Okay, I can take a hint....

HOW TO MAKE CRIME PAY

A Lecture for Apprentice Thieves in AD&D, from Guildmaster Jon Smithers

The final lecture to the apprentice thieves of Kynoch is delivered by the guildmaster. As he enters the crowded hall, a reverent hush for the wisest of thieves descends over the audience. The lecture is invariably the same, and the guildmaster always begins . . .

I'm delighted to see that we have so many of our trainees here, and that most of you have survived the rigours of training. Before unleashing you on the streets of our city to indulge in the more practical aspects of your course, I have a few words of advice.

You will receive a generally hostile reaction from so-called heroes, especially if you choose to associate yourself with them to make the most of their get rich quick missions, and it is these perilous quests I shall deal with first.

Such adventures can prove pretty tiring for members of our honourable profession, what with those high and mighty magers and clerics and those clumsy fighters pushing the poor thief around, and always in the most dangerous positions. What's more, if they achieve their goal as a result of all your skilful activities, they usually claim all the glory. But if you even fail to pick a lock, your reputation is toast.

So although I'm sure the smarter thieves amongst you have already worked out how they can rectify such an unpleasant situation, for the benefit of our slower-thinking trainees, I'll explain how.

Firstly, make sure you know exactly what you're getting yourself into. If you've heard a rumour about a treasure hoard, don't rush off unprepared with the first bunch of adventurers that happen your way. Think before you act, it is wise to find out about any problems associated with the place, and make sure you have the necessary tools to succeed. By all means scout ahead for the party, or climb up to those places they cannot reach, but ensure that your conditions for doing this are met in full. If you are discovered by the others to be quiet and to remain where they are. Whilst you are off, cover as much ground as possible so that you find out exactly what you're getting yourself into. This way you'll avoid any unnecessary danger.

Secret doors and passages, concealed fuses, and unpatrolled corridors are easy to find this way.

Finally, remember that caution is the better part of valour. Keep your wits about you at all times; if trouble is brewing you may be the only one to spot it in time and prevent disaster. If a fight seems to be going the wrong way then run away. There's little point in you dousing as well. This may seem rather cowardly, but it may well be quite useful for the party if they are captured to have an outside agent. Make sure you tell someone where you're off to before making your exit, and tell them to retreat too, otherwise you may well face some unpleasant accusations later.

Acting in this manner may not make you a hero overnight, but if any of you are thinking of entering the hero business, you're in the wrong profession. If, however, you want to stand by your appren- tice which is rather hard if you were hoping to build up a reputation - then this advice may well keep you alive. You probably won't be sung about, but your colleagues may well start respecting both you and your opinions.

This adventurous lifestyle may well not suit most of you, and indeed, it is my opinion that adventuring is for the foolhardy. Thieves should stick to being thieves. No one can outperform us in our natural element of the town, and this offers plenty of opportunity for safer adventures, and a long and prosperous career.

The more light-fingered novice is advised to consider practising the arts of the pick-pocket or cut-purse. It is ill-advised to start by just sauntering down a street, selecting a victim, casually bumping into him and picking his pocket before running off. It may well take a week or two, but in the long run it is far better to work with a team, and to plan out the operation beforehand. Besides, what happens if you're caught in the act? Hurray excuses won't convince anyone.

Whilst you are well-advised to have fellow thieves in the team, it is not absolutely necessary. The usual ploy works best with three trainee members, although can be done, at a pinch, with two. You can employ more if you want, but remember that this cuts your profits.

Each team member should be given a specific role. The first is the sex, and it is generally true that the female is best suited to this role, especially if your target is a man. The second person is the one who actually lifts the goods, and the third member acts as a decoy. His role is to carry the goods away from the scene of the crime once they have been snatched.

Choose the location for the operation and gather it. Remember that this information might well save everyone else's necks later. Not all the information you accumulate will necessarily be particularly useful, and indeed, much of it may be false, but it doesn't mean that you shouldn't take the time to find things out.

Before finally setting off, decide what to do with your compatriots. If you are thinking of entering the hero business, then you'll find that the fighters and clerics will be overburdened with armour and weaponry, and the magers will have forgotten anything except for their books. As a consequence, it falls upon you to bring along the important equipment.

The main point to remember at all times is not to overload yourself: speed and agility are your main advantages. Small, lightweight objects are, therefore, the order of the day. For weapons, daggers have obvious advantages, and you should secure a number of them about your person. The best blade to use is undoubtedly the shortsword, since any other type is too cumbersome.

You haven't been trained as expert swordsmen, and if you do have recourse to use a weapon, it should only be in the direst of emergencies. Remember to leave fighting to the professionals - it's not what they brought you along for, anyway - and use them to protect you!

A secret weapon is always useful to have for emergencies, especially in the event that you are careless enough to get yourself captured. Weapons can be hidden in a number of ingenious ways. The most obvious is a small knife hidden in the heel of your boot. Other less obvious locations for concealing knives include hatbands and belts, although you'll only be able to hide small, flat, springy throwing knives with any degree of success. Throwing knives disguised as pendants, revealing their true nature once the blade springs forth, can give you the edge—so to speak—when your opponents think you're unarmored. My personal favourite, however, is a scarf with a piece of fine wire threaded through it, which makes an effective garrotte and is especially easy to conceal.

A good rope is a vital part of any thief's equipment. One made from silk is best, since it is both strong and light. Human hair, if it suits your tastes, is also remarkably good.

If you can afford the time and money, cultivate a good relationship with an alchemist. This person can supply you with a number of useful gimmicks, such as flash and smoke bombs, and sleeping dust. These are extremely useful for covering escapes or causing panic.

A hollow tube can be useful if your travels take you near any water; it can be used for breathing through, and also for blowing that sleeping dust I mentioned through keyholes into a room. Finally, never forget your regular items of equipment, especially your lock picks.

Accompanying a group of adventurers calls for a different code of behaviour, and you should aim to conduct yourself properly if you want to keep on good terms with your fellows. It is not, therefore, a good idea to steal from your comrades. However, this does not preclude you from, shall we say, 'borrowing' a few choice items from any treasures you find. Don't overdo this since, even the stupidest barbarian will eventually realise something up if there are never any gems amongst the coins. They are especially prone to reacting in an extreme fashion, and it's a mite difficult carrying on one's profession without a head.

Carefully. A crowded place is preferable, although if it is too busy, it will only impede the smooth running of the job. Markets, fairs, inns, and the crowds around street shows are good places to operate.

Planning will help the operation run smoothly. Prepare code signals to indicate the victim and to indicate the timing of each stage. Get a good story prepared, so that if you are questioned your excuses sound plausible.

Your target is, ideally, someone who looks 'friendly' and not too powerful—heavily armed or armoured subjects should be avoided. Foreigners are the best bet, if only because no one really trusts them in the first place.

The decoy should then attract the victim's attention, thus distracting him from the events around his purse-strings. The target can be knocked so that he stumbles or falls, or the decoy can drop something in the hope that he will help retrieve it. There are other methods of course, and I won't bore you with the remarkable ingenuity shown by one of our ladies in an attempt to distract a most difficult subject. Once your victim's attention is elsewhere, the other two team members move in from opposite directions. The receiver should arrive mere seconds after the purse has been lifted, so that it is taken well away from the scene of the crime by the time the victim suspects something is wrong. Even if the police do suspect something is amiss, there will be no evidence available to indicate who is responsible.

If you can't bring yourself to trust teammates, or if a solo career appeals to you, then burglary is an option worth considering. Careful pre-planning is most important in this field, and you should make sure you know everything you can about the proposed target. If it is a shop or work place, visit it during the day so that you know some of its layout. Check the building's entrance: find out which windows are barred and shuttered. Make a note of guards and street patrols, and work out their frequency. Find out when the building is quiet so that you don't enter while its inhabitants are still awake. This checking may seem tedious, but it is for your own benefit in the long run, and will help prepare you for almost any eventuality that may occur during your intrusion.

Quiet entrances, preferably facing back streets, should be used to gain access since it is less likely you will be spotted. Night-time is best, for only a chronic insomniac is likely to bother you, and the streets should be empty, except for the odd sleepy-header guardsman. Don't just think in terms of street-level entrances. Padding along in the shadows is all very well, and indeed, one of the skills we teach — or try to teach — you. But another route is provided by the rooftops: there is less chance of running into someone, and the only occasion anyone will usually look up is if there is a noise of some kind. Travelling via the city's roofs does have its problems, and as such it is best suited to the more acrobatic thief. Watch your weight as well — it gives the profession a bad name if a portly thief accidentally falls through a trapdoor!

The rooftops have other advantages besides making you less obvious. For instance, it is far easier to abseil down a rope than it is to climb up a wall, and will give you better access to upstairs windows. There are usually enough projections for you to tie a rope around, although don't try anything stupid — like hammering nails into the leaded night.

Your escape route should be carefully worked out. It should include sidetracks, switchbacks, and double-tracks. The best escape routes utilise ground that will be uncharted. And under no circumstances should you run straight for home. Keep your head at all times, and you should be able to get out of unexpected traps. On the job, make sure you're wearing dark clothing, and nothing that will reflect light is showing. Light skin and hair is best darkened or covered, and avoid showing any toothy grins; it may well be that your new acquaintance can wait until you're safe. Those pearly-white teeth of yours can catch the light and may well give you away. Take the minimum amount of equipment: a rope if it is necessary, your weapons and lock picks, and anything specific to the mission. And don't forget to mug anything that rattles. One very useful gimmick to keep his business going, making him ripe for plundering again at a later date. And of course you also benefit from the extensive protection we can offer. If, for example, you are trying to pass yourself off as a mason, then make sure you look like one. Wear the correct dress, and even carry some of the tools of the trade — and no, a stone block will not do, that whistling saw at the back. It is also important to know a little about the subject in question, otherwise it will be very easy to catch you out.

Now on to a few basic cons you can use. Getting paid for not doing a job, such as taking a deposit, and then not doing the job can be quite profitable — as is the case with the mason scam. You simply find out who needs a job doing, undercut other competitors by a reasonable amount, demand a deposit, and then disappear. Cover as many people as possible in the shortest possible time, because bad news travels fast.

If you've hit on hard times, or just want to make a few silvers, pretending to be a beggar is an easy deception. Many of our brothers practise the art with considerable success, so I believe it. Selling things that don't belong to you is another good ruse. This can be done in two ways. In the first instance you don't even need the object to show to your customer; all you need to do is convince him that you will deliver the goods later. This is very unreliable, however, and is best used against barbarians and bumpkins. The second way is to get hold of something that doesn't belong to you, and then sell it. For instance, if you know of any empty house, then you may well be able to sell it to a number of different customers.

An effective con which will appeal to the potentially inexperienced amongst you, is one that can be used on parties of adventurers. Simply make a number of false maps which indicate the whereabouts of hidden or long-lost treasure. Disguise yourself (if possible), and then sell these maps to adventurers along with your carefully prepared story about how it came into your possession. And make sure you're well prepared for when the adventurers return — they don't have much of a sense of humour.

Regardless of the nature of your crime, always try and frame someone else, and create a distraction. These need not necessarily be substantiated later, but with a little deception can be very effective. It all helps to prevent you being caught.

Finally, and I'm sure I don't need to remind those of you who're staying with us, never forget to cut your Guild in on the profits. We like to look on it as a return for the training we've given you, and of course you also benefit from the extensive protection we can offer. Be careful out there, and don't get caught.
Going Underground

Every conscientious Gamemaster knows that Games Workshop's extensive range of Dungeon Floor Plans are the ideal aid for serious gaming. The Justice Department Accounts Division for Judge Dredd, by Marcus L Rowland

Justice Department Briefing – ACC-DIV 01-2106

The Accounts Division is probably the least understood and appreciated section of the Justice Department. Most Judges regard its members as a necessary nuisance, responsible for keeping the books and ensuring that the Justice Department receives enough tax revenue to cover expenses. While the Division is a useful brake on the excesses of Judges who squander the Justice Department’s resources, it’s also probable that Acc-Div is responsible for solving as many cases as any of the other specialised divisions, in its role as the Justice Department’s fraud squad.

For example, the Pusey kidnap case [Ref JDC p20] initially came to Justice Department attention when Acc-Div noticed a large withdrawal from Pusey’s bank account. The Da Vinci blackmail case [Ref JDJM p61] was also cracked...[CREDD-1 ABOUT YOUR GM]...by Acc-Div, though Judge Dredd made the final arrest in both cases.

While most of the specialised work of Acc-Div will not interest Judges who are working on the streets, some operations will, inevitably, require the co-operation of units from the general pool of Judges, and of other specialised divisions of the Justice Department. For example, evidence might be found to suggest that a well-known gangster is preparing to transfer funds from the Mega-City. As well as offering a golden opportunity to arrest such criminals for tax evasion, the reasons for such a transfer might be very interesting. Perhaps the mob has sold out to alien interests, another gang war is imminent, or a really large load of contraband is about to hit the streets. Payments to Blitzers and other criminal organisations might also be tracked by Acc-Div, leading to the arrest of the perps who put out the contracts. Occasionally an Acc-Div investigation will require the help of the Wally Squad (as plain-clothes investigators) in cases of fraud, and Acc-Div is naturally dependent on the help of Tek-Div’s computer expertise. Even Psi-Div have occasionally helped with Acc-Div investigations. Acc-Div has also participated in many SJS investigations; sudden acquisition of money is a sure sign of a corrupt Judge. Most Crime Blitz search teams include at least one member of Acc-Div, who is responsible for examining papers and other financial evidence.

Finally, a word of caution. Recently Acc-Div has received expense claims ranging from the ridiculous to the fantastic. One recent arrest (for littering) followed a chase which involved 6 Lawmasters, 4 H-Wagons, a Pat-Wagon, and the destruction of property worth more than thirty thousand Creds. The Klutz case [Ref JDC p38] is another classic example of over-spending; Judge Dredd made a special flight to the Asteroid Belt to arrest a minor perp on petty charges (ranging from littering to running on a walkway). Other Judges have shown similar disregard for the economics of the Justice Department, and are warned that their extravagance may eventually result in disciplinary action.

GM’s Briefing

Acc-Div is most useful as a moderately active nuisance to players. Typically, the Acc-Div Judge is the person who’s turned off a spaceship as dead weight [Ref TJCl p45], vetoes projects because they are too expensive [Ref TJC3 p63], or fails to appreciate things which should be blindingly obvious [Ref TJC3 p60]. There is reason to believe that Cal himself may once have worked for Acc-Div [Ref JC1 p4]. However, not all Acc-Div Judges are wimps; remember that the Justice Department has incredibly high standards, and that even Acc-Div Judges may occasionally see action. If you want to emphasise this point, a nice touch might be a memorial to Acc-Div Judges who were killed defending a tax office, or some other strategic economic point, during the Apocalypse War.

Acc-Div Judges should always have the Use Data ability, and often the Sense Crime ability. Other abilities should be allocated as needed. Almost all Acc-Div Judges will be Judge – 1 personnel, with a few senior Judges at Sector level and above. Acc-Div is usually overworked, and its officers tend to look pallid and out of condition from continual poring over synthi-paper ledgers and computer displays. Many will be elderly or disabled Judges who have drifted into this relatively quiet backwater after street service; they probably deserve nearly as much respect as the Tutor-Judges of the Academy.

Player Judges should not be encouraged to join Acc-Div, but may be assigned to Acc-Div as 'muscle' on a raid, as spies, or in any other role the GM may prefer. Don't always assume that Acc-Div will be efficient, reliable, or even honest; an accounting error might easily leave a Judge with no expense money, under suspicion of graft, or deprived of equipment and other resources. Although senior Acc-Div Judges will probably be street veterans, and are likely to receive periodic vetting, constant exposure to money and the technology and techniques of fraud may eventually lead an occasional renegade astray.

Acc-Div is also useful as a way of forcing Judges to do things the hard way; occasionally tell players that lab work for their case has been delayed because Acc-Div won't authorise the invoice for some new piece of crimelab technology, or that there are no H-Wagons available because the case budget won't run to them. Don't use this idea too often: it works best if the players aren't too used to arguing with Acc-Div and don't realise that they are essentially paper tigers, easily forced to back down. For example, you might tell the Judges that the case they are investigating (for example, a local illegal gambling ring) won't warrant the use of an interrogation suite without much more evidence, and thus trick them into following a perp into some form of trap.

While GMs shouldn't try to enforce hard and fast rules in this area, they should be prepared to step in when a player is taking things to ridiculous extremes.

As a rough guide, use the following equation to work out the budget for any type of investigation:

Budget = (10000 × P × V × Y) ÷ G

P = Number of perps (to maximum of 50).
G = Grade of offence.
V = Number of victims (count 'victimless' crimes as 1, to maximum of 50).
Y = Typical sentence (years; count 'Life' as 70, each month as 1/10 year, and each day as 1/300 year in short sentences).

Example 1: A gang of 3 cannibal mutants led by the evil Fanglord eat a Judge alive. There are four perps and one victim, the sentence is life, and it is a grade 1 offence. The budget will thus equal 2.8 million Creds. This may seem rather high, but remember that Judge murder investigations often involve hundreds or thousands of Judges, and massive resources. In practice the budget will probably expand as the investigation uncovers other criminal activities, and a Judge slaying should rarely be under strict budget control.

Example 2: A juve drops a gum wrapper on the street. There is one perp, the crime is victimless, the sentence is, on average, 100 days (1/3 year), and it is a grade 4 offence. The budget is thus 825 Creds. In practice most normal perps at this level will only be arrested if caught in the act, and the Justice Department will rarely bother to launch a full-scale investigation, unless some form of prevention campaign (such as a campaign against Scrawling) is in progress.

It's safe to assume that a minimum of a thousand Creds is available for any investigation, as a way of avoiding many petty calculations.

A scenario for Warhammer, by Richard Halliwell

First Witch. All hail, McDeath! Hail to thee, Thane of Glamis!
Second Witch. All hail, McDeath! Hail to thee, Thane of Cawdor!
Third Witch. All hail, McDeath, that shalt be King hereafter!
First Witch. Hail, Banquo! Lesser than McDeath, and greater.
Second Witch. Not so happy, yet much happier.
Third Witch. Thou shalt get kings, though thou be none. So all hail, McDeath and Banquo!
Banquo. [Points at Witches] Are you talking to me, jimmys?

This is an expansion scenario for use with McDeath, the latest Warhammer scenario pack: it will prove useful to have a copy of McDeath available when you play this scenario.

OUTLINE

Glen Woe simulates the murder of Dunco, the King of East Albion. The murder takes place roughly three years before the events described in McDeath.

The Settlement

1. Toll Booths. Toughness: 7; Wounds: 4. The booths have solid timber doors which face towards the road; these are fitted with bolts on the inside. They have narrow archery slits on all four sides.

2. Mill. Toughness: 7; Wounds: 5 per section. The mill is a two-storey building, each storey counts as a separate building section.

3. Toll Booths. Toughness: 7; Wounds: 4. The booths have solid timber doors which face towards the road; these are fitted with bolts on the inside. They have narrow archery slits on all four sides.

LOCATIONS

Note that the building numbers are those used in the scenario pack - building 1 is a storehouse, and doesn't appear in this battle.

TOLL BOOTHS

2. Mill. Toughness: 7; Wounds: 5 per section. The mill is a two-storey building, each storey counts as a separate building section.

Bridges. The bridges are wide enough to take two figures abreast.

Brooks. All of the brooks in Glen Givett are fast flowing and deep. Crossing takes an entire turn, and there is a risk of falling. The player should roll a d6 for each model: if the result is anything but 1 the model crosses safely. Otherwise the model slips, falls, and is carried away by the current. The game master should roll a d4; the model then suffers a single hit of attack strength equal to this result and is carried this number of inches downstream. Roll another d4. If the result is 1 or 2, the model is washed up on the far bank; 3 or 4 and it comes to rest on the near bank.

Field. The field to the west of the settlement is surrounded by a half-inch-high hedge which counts as soft cover. The gate is Toughness: 6, Wounds: 3, and is bolted.

Mountains and Cliffs. The mountains and cliffs surrounding the glen are impassable.

Woods. All woods reduce movement by half. Visibility is reduced to 2”. Missile troops wishing to fire out of wooded areas must be standing at the edge of the wood, and are counted as if in soft cover. Troops further than 2” into a wood and away from any enemy are assumed to be hidden, and, after consultation with the game master, may be removed from the table. Troops within 2” of the edge of a wood may only be assumed hidden if they spend an entire turn stationary. Their position will be revealed if they move or shoot, or if any enemy come within 6” of the wood’s edge.

PREPARATIONS
Some time before the game is due to start the game master should take a photocopy of the battlefield map. Dunco’s player will need this to mark positions and planned movements of the guards. Before the players assemble, the game master should write up command sheets for the two players using the information given here and in McDeath.

STARTING THE GAME
The game master gives the two sides their Command Sheets and answers any queries about the rules, the terrain etc. Dunco’s player now writes down which troops are sleeping in which buildings and where the guards will be stationed. Dunco’s deployment is subject to the following rules:

1. The King must be billeted alone in one of the buildings. No one else may share the building but a guard may be stationed outside.
2. The rest of the entourage may be quartered in any of the remaining houses, but no more than five models may occupy any one building.
3. All of the King’s entourage have horses: these may be either in the field, the paddock behind the inn, or the mill enclosure.
4. Three of the entourage may be on guard duty; only one of these may be a nobleman. Mergrey will refuse to stay up all night, and cannot be used as a guard. Their starting positions must be clearly marked on the player’s copy of the map.

McDeath’s player, meanwhile, must split his troops into three divisions and assign one to cover each of the roads. Each division must be led either by McDeath, Lady McDeath or Banquo and contain one of the murderers.

SEQUENCE OF ACTION
McDeath deploys his troops along the three base lines, 2” into the table. He may now move the murderers while the other troops remain stationary.

Dunco’s troops are placed on the table as and when they are seen by an enemy. Dunco cannot take command of his army until the alarm has been raised. It takes an entire turn after the alarm for them to dress, don armour and gather up their weapons.

According to the plan agreed prior to McDeath’s army splitting up into divisions, the murderers must be sent into the settlement ahead of the rest of the troops. The remaining troops may not move until an alarm is raised or the murderers return.

VICTORY
It is unlikely that more than a couple of the King’s entourage will survive; Dunco’s death is more or less guaranteed. The schedule below allows the players to assess their relative performance, given that the outcome is almost pre-ordained. If McDeath scores 4 or more points he has won; if he scores between 1 and 3 points, the game is a draw; if he scores zero or less, Dunco’s player can count himself the victor.

Victory Points for McDeath

Dunco slain +6
Banquo slain -2
McDeath slain -6
Lady McDeath slain -4
Off table -4

If any of the escaping enemy knew McDeath, Lady McDeath or Banquo were present -4
SPECIAL RULES

Visibility
The scenario takes place on a clear, moonlit night. Maximum visibility is as follows: moving model – 12”; stationary model – 6”; building – 36”.

Alarms
Dunco’s player cannot take command of his troops until an alarm has been raised. An alarm is raised the moment one of the murderers is spotted or fails to make a silent attack. If the murderers manage to kill Dunco and escape unnoticed the alarm will not be raised unless aguard spots one of McDeath’s regiments, or until one of the regiments attacks a building.

Arcs of Vision
Because of poor visibility, models can only see things within a 90° arc to their front. (For an illustration of the 90° arc band see page 18 of Combat, Volume 1 of Warhammer.)

Murderers
A murderer approaching an enemy unseen, or attacking someone who is asleep, counts the opponent’s Ws and I as 1. If the opponent is killed in the first round of combat assume the attack was silent, and that the victim didn’t have chance to cry out and raise the alarm.

COMMAND SHEETS
The game master should write out command sheets using the information given below.

Mounted Escort, 10 Soldiers
The soldiers have standard human characteristics. They carry shields, which confer a saving throw of 6, and are armed with swords. The soldiers may fight as a single regiment of 10 men or as two regiments of 5.

Commander’s Brief
You are Dunco, King of East Albion. You have just scored a decisive, devastating victory over an army of invading Norsemen and East Albion rebels. The royal entourage is now en route to a victory celebration at the castle of your friend and kinsman, McDeath. You are spending the night at Glen Givett and should arrive at McDeath’s Runsinane Castle by noon tomorrow. Although your escort is quite large and well-armed, some of the rebels are still at large: it would be a wise precaution to station guards before you retire for a night’s well-earned rest.

McDeath’s Orcs and Murderers
McDeath, Thane of Cawdor

Mergrey does not wear armour and is armed only with a dagger. He carries a shield, giving a saving throw of 6. There is also a movement penalty of 1” due to armour encumbrance. He is armed with a magic sword. The sword’s magical attributes are Will Power Drain, Resist Fire and Talking Weapon.

4 4 4 4 3 1 4 1 7 7 7 7

Banquo is armed with a sword, and carries a shield, giving an armour saving throw of 6. He is subject to Frenzy and when frenzied makes a total of four attacks. These are two sword attacks, one headbutt attack, and one kick attack. Banquo headbutts and kicks using normal characteristics; there are no penalties for fighting unarmed.

The Three Murderers
M WS BS S T W I A Ld Int WP
4 4 4 4 3 1 4 1 7 7 7 7

The murderers do not wear armour. They are armed with daggers and throwing knives.

Orc Tribe, 45 Warriors
The orcs have standard characteristics. They wear chain mail armour and carry shields, giving them a saving throw of 5 or 6, and a movement penalty of ½”. 30 of them are armed with swords, 15 with bows and daggers. The orcs can be organised into any number of regiments in multiples of 5.

Commander’s Brief
The three witches have predicted that you will become King of East Albion; their prophesies have proved correct so far. In order to fulfil the prophesy you are about to murder Dunco, the present monarch. Your army is split into three divisions: each division includes a skilled murderer, contracted to slay the king. You are personally in charge of one of the divisions; the other two are led by Lady McDeath, and Banquo, your lieutenant and best friend. Each division is blocking one of three escape routes from the glen. The prearranged plan is to send the murderers in first to find Dunco and kill him in his sleep. Anyone trying to escape from the Glen must be stopped; the whole royal retinue should then be wiped out.

The Advanced Dungeons & Dragons rules only give very vague hints on how a Thieves’ or Assassins’ Guild functions in a fantasy city. This article was written to give referees and players various ideas and suggestions about the working and use of a criminal guild in their own fantasy campaign.

The Nature of a Thieves’ Guild
The presence of a Thieves’ Guild in a city-oriented campaign surely adds ‘colour’ to the setting. Moreover, it provides the referee with plenty of plots and adventure ideas. Members of a Guild can be used as interesting opponents or rivals for a party, especially if player character thieves are present.

Players and referees should not be misled by the word ‘Guild’. A Thieves’ Guild is by no means a mundane and official group, like a merchants’ or craftsmen’s corporation, but is a secret and powerful criminal organization about which very little is known – apart from its existence. It wields great power in the underworld, and, to a lesser extent, over the whole city. It could loosely be described as a medieval Mafia.

Guild Membership
Not all thieves in a city will necessarily belong to the Guild; it depends very much on the nature of the thief. Muggers and petty thieves are unlikely to be involved but most burglars, ‘locksmiths’ and other specialized thieves are likely to be members of the Guild.

Any competent thief (i.e., a player character thief) arriving in town will usually be approached within 24 hours by a Guild emissary, who, unless he takes special precautions to travel incognito, will ask the character to join the ranks of the Guild: if he accepts, the character will be blindfolded and taken to a secret meeting place. There, the guildmaster – or one of his lieutenants – will make him sign an enlistment contract, establishing his duties and benefits as a Guild member. Should the character try to double-cross or betray the Guild, the most likely result will be his elimination by some hired assassins.

If the character refuses to enter the Guild when first contacted, he’ll be due for a rough time, especially if he’s successful. In this case, the Guild will probably arrange his capture by the local militia, force him out of town or, at the very extreme, have him assassinated. Members of the Thieves’ Guild must swear an oath of secrecy and loyalty to the guildmaster and his lieutenants. They must pay 20% of all they steal to the Guild. Should a thief attempt to ‘conceal’ any illegal income, and this fact is discovered, he’ll be ‘warned’. A thief will be expelled from the Guild and driven out of town when he receives his third warning.

In addition to their own crimes, members may also participate in Guild jobs: top-class burglaries, kidnappings, and other shady operations engineered and co-ordinated by one of the Guild’s lieutenants. Fifty percent of the total haul goes directly to the Guild; the other half is shared out equally between the participating Guild members.

Guild members should not expect their fellow thieves to pay for their own failure or carelessness: the Guild is quite unlikely to rescue captured members (except for Guild lieutenants or very worthy members caught while executing a Guild job). The Guild could well send assassins to murder an imprisoned thief to prevent him from making some embarrassing revelations under torture or interrogation. Careful, clever thieves will insure they are rarely caught, and can generally arrange their own escape. Captured thieves who manage to escape are generally ejected from the Guild, unless their escape took place before any serious interrogation could be made. In such a case, the thief concerned will not be permitted to take part in any important job for one month. Remember that ‘a thief’s prime tool is anonymity’ (old thiefly saying).

Guild Lieutenants
Lieutenants are the direct assistants of the guildmaster. They are chosen by the guildmaster himself from among the cleverest and most skilful members. A Guild will typically have from four to twelve lieutenants, depending on the size of the town. Lieutenants act as middlemen between the guildmaster and the other Guild members. They are in charge of organising, and sometimes carrying out, Guild jobs. Each lieutenant is also given an assignment; this may range from controlling criminal activities in a particular town district (e.g., West Quarters, Merchants’ Avenue, etc.) to the supervision of a specific type of operation (such as burglaries, kidnappings, rackets, recruiting, rumour and information collecting, and so on).

When money goes to the Guild as a result of a Guild job (see Guild Membership), half of that amount is distributed equally between all the lieutenants. The remainder is then divided by two: one share is given to the guildmaster, and the other goes to the lieutenant who organized the job. For example, from a total haul of 2000gp, 1000gp are received by the Guild. If it has 5 lieutenants, the guildmaster will receive 250gp, the lieutenant who ran the job will gain 350gp and each of the four remaining lieutenants will receive 100gp.

In the case of 'personal' jobs (see Membership), the 20% rake-off goes directly to the guildmaster.

The Guildmaster
The guildmaster is the central character of the whole organization. He delegates the tasks to the lieutenants, and sometimes takes care of the whole organization. He also delegates the tasks to the apprentices. He is a ruthless man who has control of the guild.

The Guildmaster greatly affects the working of the organization. Most of the time, the guildmaster will be the best thief in town. He could, however, be something very different - such as a very wealthy merchant or a criminal whose only goal is to live a big life. If he is a merchant, he will become a successful merchant in an underground house. If he is a criminal, he will become a rich and powerful criminal. He will have to face the threats of the street urchins and the rival guilds. He is the one who will determine the fate of the guild.

Spies, Informants and Contacts
The Guild will also have a vast network of spies and informants scattered throughout the city. They are often used by the guild to get important information about the enemies of the guild. They also get an annual fee for their services.

Instructors
Guild instructors are special members who are trained by the Guild's instructors to become full members. They are recruited by the guildmaster and he contacts them. They are usually hired by the guild to get important information about the enemies of the guild. They also get an annual fee for their services.

Specialists
A typical Thieves' Guild will maintain a small body of highly skilled specialists - such as forgers, locksmiths, druggists, and even armours. The number of specialists depends on the Guild's needs. The specialists are vital to the Guild, as the skills and abilities of future members depend solely on their competence. Optionally, instructors could also train specialists in specific skills, such as disguise, escapology, and acrobatics.

Guild Headquarters
The location and type of Guild Headquarters is important. While a mansion situated near the city's criminal brotherhoods always adds to the flavour of the game, the location should be something unique and interesting. It could also lead to a secret meeting place where projects and decisions are debated by the guildmaster and lieutenants.

Feuds and Rivalries
Apart from the local authorities, a Thieves' Guild could have other powerful enemies - for instance, a competing criminal corporation, or a specialized branch of the Merchants' Guild which hires swordsmen and bodyguards to counteract the Thieves' Guild's activities. This element will certainly spice things up in some player characters' lives.

Allies and Support
To be powerful and effective, the Thieves' Guild needs rich and influential friends (such as merchants, nobles, courtesans, officials, and high-ranking wizards), ready to help the Guild when serious financial or legal problems arise. These 'friends', however, are not necessarily motivated by friendship or ideological interest. Blackmail and bribery are also excellent ways to acquire support. A crafty guildmaster will also have alliances with other powerful personalities of the underworld, such as rich madams, the leader of the street urchins, the local Grandfather of Assassins, and ship captains interested in smuggling. These alliances are quite flexible and could well be broken in times of crisis.
Besides the usual number of letters about sexism, young gamers et al, this month's mailbag has also contained a few letters congratulating me on my new position as Editor of this publication. Thank you, thank you, thank you. I can promise you that the magazine will be heading in a new direction soon, but for the moment...

Shirley Carbery, Stourbridge: Some of the male readers who replied to my letter seemed to have a mental instability in recognising the differences between reality and fantasy. They expressed the strange view that medieval role-playing games must be as authentic as possible, and as such women should hold subservient roles in keeping with their supposed position in society in the Middle Ages: in fact I was told I should be grateful women are even included. At the same time, to recreate this authentic atmosphere, elves, dwarfs, orcs, hobgoblins don't exist, have never existed (not even in medieval times) and never will. This attitude was exemplified by the rather naive and chauvinistic views of writers like D Green in WD74 (I didn't realise feminism was a dirty word, Mr Green) and S Evans in WD73. The whole point of role-playing fantasy is pure fantasy. I don't want to hear any more rubbish concerning authenticity, and in my opinion it's foolish to think that you could actually achieve any realism.

D G Bell, North Kelsey: The letter from Miss Carbery has filled your letters page with more opinionated ignorance than any other I can recall. People have claimed the support of history, fantasy fiction, and game design in their attempts to discount Miss Carbery's complaint. Despite all this, I cannot see any reason not to support her. History certainly doesn't deny the presence of women warriors. It is, quite likely, true that (male) historians have tended to ignore the many women who have taken up a pen or a sword in politics and war. It isn't really relevant that the vast majority of women were treated very badly by modern standards, as when we talk about characters in games we are already talking about exceptional people. Besides that, working magic, polytheism, and intelligent non-human mortals would turn the superstitious, Christian, purely human medieval society of historical Europe into something totally different.

Some of your readers will not like the idea that Robert E Howard and John Norman are not the only writers of fantasy. Between that extreme and that of the far-feminists there are a lot of writers who create plausible women filling every niche in the fantasy character range. Finally there is the game design argument. There are people playing RPGs today who don't realise that they can produce their own scenarios, think that the designer's words are writ in flame imperishable, and play games that have the same garbishes on the module covers. There used to be a lot said about the creative element in role-playing games; now it seems to have almost been forgotten. In the end, the rules are one person's interpretation of a sub-created reality. Any resemblance between characters in any role-playing game and any persons alive or dead is purely coincidental.

Shirley Carbery: In reply to S Evans's eloquently written letter in WD73 as to why I persist in buying this magazine if I object to some imaginary women; does Mr Evans expect me to live like a hermit?! I buy this magazine because I want to find out more concerning RPGs; just as when I buy a newspaper to read the news, I am annoyed by pictures of naked women. Everywhere I look, Mr Evans, my femininity is insulted — it won't do any good just to run and hide.

Simon Polley, Leeds: If you really are a nudie mag, shouldn't you be called Camera Weekly like all the rest?

Funny you should mention that, one of the forthcoming changes is the title. . .

Alan Bishop, Herne Bay: Oh boy! At the risk of becoming the target of all 'regular' WD scribes, I wish to appeal to the Spirit of Fence-Sitting Peace-Lovers. Okay, so sexism and the age war are major issues (especially if the reader is a ten-year old female RPG'er), but due to the very nature of these subjects, even after months of discussion (which has developed into a general gripe, including backstabbing and 'raking-up-old-quotes-and-using-the-same-arguments'), nobody has changed their views (go on, someone prove me wrong, please)!

And so, what's the point? Can't we have some letters about less volatile, non-serious subjects? What ever games we are already talking about precisely is the point. What ever genre of the game. Be it Superheroes or dragon-vanquishing warriors it takes skill to succeed.

Dave Morris, London: Gamesmanship was the best thing in WD75, though it's kind of depressing that most people need to be told this kind of thing at all. I'd like to see more men retreating by dividing their RPG rules into game mechanics and game reality sections, so the GM can take care of the numbers and stats while the players enjoy the fantasy.

To add my hamper the won of Matthew Hytch's many useful suggestions, I always think that generic names for magic items are absurd. Players might classify the item the party's just found as a Ring of Protection or whatever, but the typical character's understanding should be along the lines of this must be the vambrace of Sigurd Ironeyes, the legendary Mercanian reaver of whom it is said he could cut down a line of mermaids and love... . The generic labels are just there for the GM's convenience.

Stuart Cox, Horley: What else can I say but a humble 'thank you', Pete Tamlyn. How to Save the Universe was an extremely well thought out article and hopefully one which will convert the polemic outburst from Matthew Carbring. Perhaps he and his ilk should take time to read these comics that spawned Superhero role-playing. Admittedly some are tedious, but any who venture to read Batman, Daredevil, and X-Men will gleeful, fulfilling stories. I suspect those expecting 'Boffs' and 'Biffs' will be surprised. Role-playing is for role-players whatever the genre of the game. Be it Superheroes or dragon-vanquishing warriors it takes skill to succeed.

Fredric Wayland, Dublin: Matthew Carrington is not the only person who dislikes Superhero role-playing. Pete Tamlyn's article has not changed my views. Are we role-playing or hero-playing? Role-playing includes historical rolegames designed to give the player the feel of another time and land. What was believed in is effectively real, which explains magic and the like, never Superheroes. For this reason, role-playing business, politics and travel of any time or land can be more exciting and relevant than it is possible here.

I, and I hope most people, play role-games for experience and interaction with the milieu. For this to happen, player characters need to be normal humans who develop normal skills through the game. I can see no advantage through the use of their skills, wits and good fortune. Rolegames allow player characters to make mistakes, die, have accidents and to learn from them. Any true novel will, likewise, give an experience of the world it explores.

Tim Norman, North Ascot: All right, this page - seem to be taking their opinions of comics and thus the games from the old (dana-nana-nana-nana) Batman! series and film. Now let's get one thing straight. Batman was a (semi-cult) COMEDY. It exaggerated many of the conventions that were evident in the comics at the time, but the 'Biff, Oof, Pow!' routine and the 'Holy aircraft cupcakes' bit were designed to be funny, if only a bit too silly. Comics weren't too much like that then, and they're certainly not like that now.

Dave Morris: The Heart of the Dark looks good - and no stats either which is an intriguing departure. So how about trying the same idea with a (high) fantasy scenario?

Did someone mention High Fantasy?

Dave Langford, Reading: Can it be that Tony Allen didn't read my review? I ask this since all his comments seem to avoid the point: that high fantasy in a high style is difficult to bring off. All reviewing is subjective. Subjectively, I don't think Sceptre Mortal came off. In case any readers were so silly as to read the review because his guy is obviously a fandom demi-god - listen to him. Steve Gilham obviously hasn't bought a fanzine for a very long time because (a) he would have realised that the current one or two which try to cut through the mental grease and grime and get to the root of the problems. The point about fanzines is that the buyer can find a style he likes and stick to it.

Rich Mumford, Harrogate: Steve Gilham is a prat. All fanzines are like SEWARS are they? Well, there you have it from an obvious expert in the field; if they bother to design a game, or even silly. Comics weren't too much like that then, and they're certainly not like that now.

Andrew Meek, Burgess Hill: The Philippines have discovered suddenity! This doesn't mean that you've given the great and brilliant Marshall on Terror at Trollmarsh. I for one did not actually want to see one of my favourite groups derided by the 'complete rubbish', by the 'infernal nuisances' Peter and Janet Vials (doubtless actually Viles). In future can you pair keep their lack of good taste to themselves?

Letters about generic scenarios continue to trickle in.

Roger Musson, Edinburgh: I think Alex Tingle and Mark Rogers undermine or misunderstand the virtues of generic scenarios. Firstly, I doubt that plenty of books, comics or films provide easily adaptable scenarios. More often than not they hinge upon such specialised characters or settings that they will not easily fit into any pre-existing FRP campaign. And frequently they rely on creaky plot devices that work all right when the author is in sole control, but would never be acceptable in a FRP game.

Secondly, it is certainly not true that a generic scenario is just a system scenario with the stats removed. A D&D scenario that made heavy use of clerical or druidic skills my generic scenario insomuch as many FRP systems do not feature clerical or druidic classes.

Thirdly, as far as using scenarios in a campaign setting goes, most DMs are going to have to do a conversion exercise anyway - reconciling the scenario background with the campaign background, and adapting the difficulty of the scenario according to the current strength of the player characters. Which brings me to my main point. I have no objection to seeing scenarios published in any system from D&D to Palladium/Gearbox. What I do want to see is more scenarios that are generic in nature, rather than in presentation, and that can be easily adapted to any other system because they do not rely heavily on the mechanics of any other system. In particular, I should like to see an end to this 'suitable for 6-8 characters level 4-7 business. I want to see scenarios suitable for any characters.

My comment that many generic scenarios are simply system-tied adventures without the stats was actually based on the fact that if a stat-less scenario was strongly cleric-oriented (say), then it would show in the nature of the adventure. Otherwise, I think I can generally agree with your points.

And for our closing letter this issue...

Peter Gilboy, Basingstoke: I must say that when people think we are devil worshipers, pictures like the one on the cover of issue 75 can only reinforce their views. It is the most direct and least offensive image that I have ever seen since someone took a picture of the editorial team at White Dwarf.

That was the editorial team of WD!
One of the best things about the Golden Heroes game is the way in which you are encouraged, through rules, words and deeds, to use the system for running campaign-style games rather than one-off scenarios. I have always been a fan of campaign games: my argument is that you can become far more familiar with your character, and get far more out of the role-playing experience, if this character is one that you have lived with over several interconnected adventures, rather than a playing piece that is trotted out for individual scenarios. Nevertheless I know that there are many role-players who prefer to play in campaigns, and even some who are so horrified by the amount of work that seems to be involved that they do not believe that anyone would be so daft as to actually try it. Fear not, it is not as hard as it might seem, and since Golden Heroes puts so much effort into persuading you to play campaigns, what better system to choose to explain how to go about it.

The essence of a campaign-style game is that the players keep the same characters for each adventure, and that the game master links things together by using the same world and providing a time frame for the adventures. The overall effect is something like a long-running TV series. Some campaigns end up rather like The A-Team where each adventure (episode) is complete in itself and nothing much is known about what happens in between. The better ones, however, are closer to Dynasty or Dallas in that each episode is also part of a continuing story. One of the things about soaps that makes them so addictive is that there are always several storyline going on at once, and there is no obvious end. Of course you cannot model role-playing campaigns directly on soaps because you want each adventure to come to some sort of conclusion at the end of a playing session, rather than stop just as things get exciting as a TV programme would. However, if you link things together by involving the players in things other than adventuring, and you try to leave a few loose ends hanging at the end of each scenario, then you will have a much longer-playing experience.

Stan did with Marvel was to take all of the comics set in an identifiable Marvel Universe. This gave a consistent background to the stories, and a sense that something was happening in the world as a whole, not just in the confines of an individual story in a comic. Also, he based that universe on contemporary America. Most readers find this a lot easier to relate to than a completely artificial world, which means that the writers can use real world events as well as events in other comics to increase the sense of depth that the stories have. Finally Stan used the soap opera format and plot lines in narrative - what happened in yesterday's story will affect what happens in subsequent ones. Marvel's main rivals, DC, used to pay much less attention to such things as continuity in their universe, which is one of the major reasons that Marvel overtook them in popularity.

Our Golden Heroes campaign should take a leaf or two out of Marvel's book, and our first requirement is, therefore, to create a Golden Heroes Universe. You could, if you wanted, simply use the Marvel or DC worlds (though you might be advised to wait until DC's logical world has been rationalized a bit more before using it). However, there are other games available or on the way that already do that, so the material that you will find in the Golden Heroes game and any accessory packs will be for GH's own world. Besides, Marvel and DC stories are based largely in America whereas GH is a British game designed by British people and played, at least in the short term, largely by British players. One of the nice things about Superhero games is that you can set them in the real world in modern times, and that does away with a large amount of the work needed to design and detail your campaign world. OK, so you might have one or two players who want to play The Batsmen and live in Gotham City, but advice is that if you live in Britain, set the game in Britain.

Integrating the Heroes

Having got a basis for our campaign world (and I am assuming that the campaign is to be set in Britain) we now have to think how the presence of superpowered characters will affect it, and what changes we intend to make to the world that they occupy. One strategy is to deviate from your source of inspiration because of the danger imposed by players who might know more about the world than you do. (Imagine trying to run a Middle-earth game with players who know Tolkien inside out!) However, with a game set in your own country in modern times, chances are you will know just as much about it as anyone else, or at least can find information very easily. In my Golden Heroes campaign I have stuck as closely as possible to contemporary Britain, making changes due to the existence of superpowered characters only where necessary, and advancing the date by a year to avoid having my plots tied too closely to actual news stories.

Using a contemporary society in this way gives you a huge amount of background material to work with, and presents vast numbers of possibilities for developing plotlines. You don't need to agonise about who is in charge of the country and what their policies will be - you just have to imagine what Margaret Thatcher and Douglas Hurd would make of superheroes. And you have a huge supporting cast of public figures to use. For example, in my game one of the heroes was invited to appear on the Terry Wogan show!

In addition to this you can bring in a few characters from fictional material set in the same society. No streetwise London hero worth his salt can get away without knowing Arthur Daley; and it may well provide a good deal of amusement during a game to have the players find out that the building the villains have just levelled was in fact the Crossroads Motel. If you are really keen on the science fiction aspect of Golden Heroes then your players would doubtless be well advised not to change into costume in any police telephone boxes.

Still, that's enough of the good ideas for the moment, let's go on with the rest of the campaign.
the villains once they have caught them? Is there a special maximum security wing at Dartmoor, or has a new prison been built somewhere in the highlands of Scotland? Are there any new laws that might be passed to deal with the activities of superpowered beings, and do insurance companies pay up if your home is wrecked by an exchange of energy bolts? If aliens really do visit the Earth, does the government admit to the existence of UFOs and, if so, what do they claim to be doing about it?

Villainous Behavior

On the subject of villains we need to consider how criminals who are currently newsworthy would be affected by superpowered aid. What if the IRA had a superpowered ally? Do the Russians use superpowered spies? Could the Libyans pay supervillains to commit acts of terrorism on their behalf? If you want to use familiar bad guys then you will have to beef them up a bit or the players will find them far too easy to beat.

Finally we need to consider where the supplies of high tech equipment used by superpowered people come from. It would, I think, be quite possible to use existing multinational companies such as IBM but such organisations tend to be rather dull and boring. A more entertaining game would probably result from having most of the player involvement with smaller, highly innovative companies run by colourful characters like Sir Clive Sinclair. If there were Superheroes about I’m sure that Sir Clive would be first in the field with cut-price build-it-yourself cybernetic combat armour! Using small companies like this has the added advantage that they are prone to running into financial difficulties which you can turn into a plot ideas by having them fall foul of a rich international crime syndicate.

Making Waves

Having got a world to set our campaign in we next need to look at ways of developing plotlines for adventures. As I explained earlier, a campaign will work best if each individual scenario seems to be part of a continuing narrative. As the lives of the player characters progress they may pick up on the early warning signs as long term plots begin to unfold, and they will certainly suffer the consequences of their earlier actions. Presenting a campaign in this manner rather than as a series of unconnected encounters does require a certain amount of planning and record keeping, but the results can be well worth it.

Fortunately Golden Heroes provides several useful features which aid in the generation of long term plots. The most obvious of these is the rationale which players are required to write when they generate their characters. In producing a rationale a player will almost certainly give you several ideas for future adventures, by writing into it people his character has met, comments about his personality, and so on. In effect, each character comes complete with his own microcosm of background that can grow and develop with him as the campaign progresses. I find it useful to go through a similar rationale generation for every villain that I invent, as the need to explain the character’s origin often supplies sufficient inspiration for me to generate new plot ideas, as well as meaning that the bad guy is a much more rounded and believable character when he finally gets into play.

Another helpful facet of the Golden Heroes game is that the scenarios available for it are produced with campaign style play in mind. Some common threads (DICE, for example) crop up regularly, and you will find advice in the scenario booklet not only on how to run the adventure in question, but also how to adapt it to your own campaign and what future events may arise from what happens during play. Legacy of Eagles is additionally helpful in that it was deliberately designed to help a group of players just starting out as a super-team. Building on what happens during scenarios that you run is an important part of creating a successful campaign. It may seem a bit of a drag at the time, but making a few notes as play progresses on which NPCs get on very well or very badly with which players can help a lot with maintaining an air of consistency. With the whole game to run it is easy to forget that player A and villain X were in contact back in chapter one. It would be as if you were sure that A will remember X and the game will seem a lot more believable to him if X also remembers their enmity and reacts accordingly next time they meet.

In addition a long-term plot can quite often grow spontaneously simply as a result of following up the implications of what happens during play. Suppose your villains are sent off in a space shuttle with a beautiful crystal as a result of the help your players give them. Obviously the crystal will be on display, and inevitably someone will try to steal it. In fleeing the pursuing heroes the villain could perhaps drop the crystal into impenetrable jungle where it is found by a lost civilisation ruled over by magician-priests. Before the players manage to recover the crystal the light it gives off in the jungle has magical properties. They use these to attack beings in another dimension who, naturally, decide to attack Earth in order to destroy the crystal. And so on. Try to keep your options open by always having that there are always a few loose threads at the end of each adventure.

The Plot Thickens

Something else that you should do for each scenario you run is build on the background that you supply for it. Perhaps you do this anyway for scenarios you write yourself, but commercially produced material may not have room to cover everything in depth. For example, Legacy of Eagles introduces the long lost EAGLES team of Golden Heroes who were immortalised in the 1950s and 60s. The scenario booklet suggests a possible line-up for the EAGLES but gives very little detail about any of them except Protector and Micron (who figure in the scenario). For my own campaign I not only invented my own EAGLES team but also wrote up some of their history (throwing in a few asides, such as mentioning how much better Wilson looks when he’s been taken with them, in order to add a bit more colour). I had other members of the team survive (or at least suggested that they might have done), one of whom has since joined the players' team. This gives me a moderately powerful and experienced NPC that I can use to help the players when they are stuck.

Of course, if you are going to be using long-term plots in your campaign then it will be necessary for you to plan ahead. Fortunately the 'good shall triumph' ethos of the genre means that you can rely much more on knowing the outcome of the scenarios in advance. The details will be more difficult to predict, but you should have a good idea of where the player characters will be and when. With the aid of a desk diary (try looking around for one in midsummer when places like W H Smith are often selling the current year's diaries off at ridiculous prices) you should be able to plan out the various plotlines a few months of game time in advance. Knowing which scenarios will be coming up you can then turn them into long term plots by inserting references to them in current adventures. Prestige scientific projects can be mentioned in news broadcasts whilst they are under development; mercenary supervillains can be sprung from jail a few weeks before they are required by the criminal mastermind; vital components for a mad genius's latest doomsday device can be stolen; street contacts can pass on rumours, and so on. Dropping clues concerning forthcoming scenarios like this has the added advantages that it makes both current and future scenarios more challenging for the players because they have to sort out which of the clues they get are immediately relevant, and have to remember information from one gaming session to the next.

That Was The Week That Was

One final trick that is well worth using because it does so much to generate atmosphere for your campaign is to run a campaign newsletter. The activities of various Superheroes will inevitably be splashed across the front pages of the daily press, and the heroes will be dogged by photographers and camera crews whenever they appear in public. Issuing a regular newsletter full of excerpts from papers and TV reports concerning the activities of your players will make them much more aware of the world in which they live, and of their responsibilities to the general public. It also gives you a chance to have a lot of fun writing pastiches of the national newspapers. As an example, I will cite a few extracts from the newsletter of my own campaign.

'To begin with the players were totally unknown, but one of them elected to do a lot of patrolling and therefore came to the attention of the press very quickly. I thought that the Sun would be the first paper to realise the potential site of Golden Heroes, and so I quickly adapt the character in its usual, bombastic style:

'She's at it again! Yes, it's that girl again. Thieves sneaking on Sun's own super heroine, Virago, has foiled another daring robbery. This time a million pound jewellery snatch in sparkling Hatton Garden. Our reporters were quickly on the scene and managed to watch these close-up pictures of the lovely lady. We even managed to snatch a few words with her before she slipped away to continue her fight against crime. And do you know what? She even made her own costume.'

What a gal!'...

The Daily Telegraph would probably hedge its bets to begin with. Happy to have someone fighting crime but wary of endorsing mutants or aliens, it would keep a close eye on government action. Using the opportunity to score a few political points as well:

'Prime Minister's Question Time yesterday was given over largely to questions from both sides of the House on the subject of superpowered vigilantes. For the opposition Barry Sproat MP asked whether the Prime Minister, having destroyed most other national institutions, now intended to privatise the Police Force and put the safety of Britain's citizens in the hands of whatever bizarrely costumed individuals 'the market' might throw upт. Mrs Thatcher countered that the power of Citizen's Arrest had long been an important part of our legal traditions and that she saw no need to scrap the system just because some enterprising people were actually exercising their power. From the Government benches the Honourable Michael Harman MP inquired whether the Prime Minister has any plans to reform the EAGLES Superhero team. Mrs Thatcher, who has been so successful in the 50s and 60s. Somewhat to the dismay of the wetter end of the Tory benches, Mrs Thatcher commented that whilst a lot of what Mr Macmillan's government had done was very well intentioned, she felt that many of its achievements could have been brought about much more cheaply by use of market forces. Dr David Owen also attempted to contribute to these discussions, but his comments were lost amidst cries of derision from both sides of the House.'

The Guardian, I thought, would be worried about the effect of Golden Heroes on civil liberties, and its reports would be punctuated with the usual typesetting errors:

'Concern over the growing number of superpowered individuals in Britain mounted yesterday after the morning's pitched battle between the army, a group of costumed vigilantes and a mysterious, armoured figure in central London. The National Council for Civil Liberties is to press the Government to take urgent action to pass legislation to protect ordinary citizens from the dangers that such paranormal beings pose. At present both the Government and DICE, the EEC-funded anti-terrorist paramilitary group, are refusing to comment on either yesterday's battle, the mysterious disappearance and rescue of Italian actress, Lola Novana, 28, or the large number of reported sightings of a UFO near Guildford yesterday evening.'

That should be enough to give you the flavour of a newsletter. With any luck you will soon find your players vying for the best press coverage. After all, we all like to see our names in the papers, don't we?

Pete Temlyn is the author of Games Workshop's latest Golden Heroes adventure pack, The Lancelot Caper.
Good evening, or if you're watching me on video, good morning! Since the alien demonstrations and alien outcries of the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther Jr., the exploitation of "Fellow Beings" has been prohibited in all but the most totally xenophobic systems, such as the Solar System. This has meant a big boom in the need for real monsters to play themselves. A foreboding in this field is GARR, the FLESH-RENDER, or Chris to his friends.

Caught up with Chris on location, working on his latest film, "Titan Final," or as I prefer to say and you may disagree with me and who am I to say you're wrong, a parrot. Knuckles was a return to the role that made him famous, that of the bug-eyed beastie with long pointy teeth.

I asked Chris about his first film, "Alien," and about how it felt working with humans, and Ridley Scott:

CHRIS: TERRIBLE! (LAUGHS) No seriously, there's an old Hollywood saying, "Never work with humans or aliens." YIKES, but they were ok, and PADDY-BAZA: RIDLEY SCOTT.

CHRIS: YEAH, "FLESH." He was just wonderful—HELauncher BEAUTIFULLY.

BAZA: AND OF COURSE THERE WAS THE GORGEOUS SHIRLEY WAINWEBER AND THE NOT-SO GORGEOUS UNLESS YOU'RE A BIT LIKE THAT ANYWAY I DON'T DARE YOUR PRESENCE ALTHOUGH I HAVE NONE BUT YOU MAY HAVE, JOHN HURT.

CHRIS: YEAH.

BAZA: CHRISTIE, OLD CHUM-OLDMAT, YOU PLAYED A BACTERIUM IN "THE ANDROMEDA STRAIN," DIDN'T YOU FIND THAT A LITTLE, (LAUGHS) UNUSUAL?

CHRIS: NO, NOT AT ALL. IT WAS A VALUABLE EXPERIENCE: YOU GET A WHOLE NEW OUTLOOK ON LIFE WHEN YOU'RE ONLY ZOMBIES AND... MARK IN JOHN CARPENTER'S "THE THING"—YOU GET TO DISPLAY, AND YOU MAY DISAPPEAR WITH ME, AND WHY NOT, BECAUSE I AM ONLY HUMAN AND I DON'T FOLK TO BE GOD, YOUR TALENTS TO THEIR FULLEST.

CHRIS: NO, NOT REALLY. AN INDUSTRIAL DISPUTE AT 1LM, SOMETHING ABOUT NON-UNION MEMBERS DOING PARTS OF NON-MECHANICAL SENSATIONAL EFFECTS AND BAZA: IF I WAS DOUBLE FOR THE MOST PART BY A LATEX FOAM, PUPPET.

BAZA: "IN THE BEAST THAT LEAPS OUT FROM BEHIND! YOU ARE CREDITED WITH INJECTING HUMOUR INTO THE ROLE.

BAZA: ON YAH, THE "MADONNA BABY KICKER AND INTESTINE COBBLER." YAH, WEL STEVE AND I THOUGHT IT WAS A BIT HAMMY, SO WE LIGHTEN IT UP.

BAZA: AND THE RED NOSE WAS YOUR IDEA WAS IT?

CHRIS: YEAH.

BAZA: LOVELY, AND AFTER THIS?

CHRIS: I THINK I'LL BECOME PRESIDENT! (LAUGHS) NO SERIOUSLY, I SEE MYSELF DOING THEATRE, I'M HUGELY SIGNED UP TO DO LEARN AT THE NATIONAL, LOTS OF TEETH AND SLIME AND LASERS COMING OUT OF ME, AND MAYBE A BOOK ON MYSELF!

BAZA: "THE INNER COSTUME COME TO ME?"

BAZA: "CHRIS THE MONSTER, THANK YOU!"

CHRIS: MY PLEASURE BAZZA.

CASTLE IN THE WIND

An AD&D scenario for 5th-8th level characters, by Venetia Lee, with Paul Stamforth

A sky castle – a magical impossibility – is adrift in the wind. Its gardens are slowly withering, the hippogriffs grow restive, and the Queen calls for fires to be lit when none have been needed before. The first battle has been fought for possession of this wonder, and the adversary forced to flee, but not defeated – for he stole that which was without price. The Queen searches her mirrors for a champion but time is short – a common adversary is already making plans.

BACKGROUND

Geography

The scenario is set in the land of Choyxus (Map 1). The adventure begins on the caravan road in the Southern desert, above which the Sky Castle is drifting. The search follows this road to the pre-desert where a little scrub vegetation grows, and nomads wonder with flocks of sheep and camels. Nearer still to the mountains there are cultivated fields, and lines of vertical shafts mark the passage of underground canals. Finally the search leads to the oasis town of Maratash and an army camp in the desert. The curiously flat-topped Mount Choyxus dominates the surrounding scenery.

Culture

The cultural setting is Persian in a broad sense. It corresponds to no particular time or place on the Earth (indeed, they have not yet even mastered the art of dome building). The land is rich but its hold on wealth is precarious, and depends mainly on the fragile irrigation system and the fluctuations of international trade. Hence the bureaucracy is all powerful, and efficient – even when it is corrupt. It has survived changes of rulers – and even changes of dynasty – intact.

Women are excluded from much of public life, but are not without influence. Those of the upper classes are hedged about with restrictions: they are almost unable to speak to any man outside the family, although they are not forced into complete seclusion.

Female player characters of more liberal cultures are not expected to follow the same customs providing they remain modest, and indeed, may have the best of both worlds, since they may speak to everyone.

Finally this is a culture without inn's. On the road in towns, hostel are maintained for all travellers, but these have no staff and no luxuries. For long visits people would stay in the private houses of friends and acquaintances, providing most of their own meals but paying nothing since reciprocity is expected.

Major towns are cosmopolitan so foreigners who wish to be on friendly terms with their companions, who could also provide advice and information about their adopted land.

INDUCTION

About 100 yards from the road is a large pavilion, set on a gold-plated framework. The roof is open to reveal silk covered couches and a table beyond. If anyone approaches the pavilion a female djinni appears with a clasp of thunder. She utters a welcome in the name of her master and bids them observe the magic of the pavilion: all of her whispered word the flap of wings and cannot be overcome. She can make a knife penetrate the fabric; at another point the whole structure folds into a tiny sphere. Inside the temple there is pleasantly cool and, at another word, ewers of fruit juice and baskets of bread appear.

'This can belong to you if you undertake a task for my master,' she states.

If interest is shown the djinni gives a signal and some twenty hippogriffs and riders become visible as they come in to land. She announces them as King Smerdis and his retinue. A meeting will be convened in the pavilion. After polite preliminaries, Smerdis explains that he has recently become the victim of a very clever burglar; a burglar who escaped on a stolen hippogriff, carrying both a gem of great price and his daughter. He desires the capture, alive, of the thief, and the return, unharmed, of the gem, his daughter, and the hippogriff. For attempting this service he offers the pavilion (command words to be given on return and report, including the one causing it to self-destruct). For the return of the gem, the tent, and the girl, he offers the characters' weight in gold for each one. The safe return of the hippogriff will be rewarded with the valuable object with weight in silver will be paid for information which leads to their return. Since it is foolish to argue with kings, and it is a royal command, the characters are ordered to take the task.

Once the task is accepted, more information will be revealed. Smerdis explains that the thief was able to overcome their own defences against him so pursuit was impossible. However, they have a good idea of his route, and know that he headed for the trade town of Maratash, the only city on the desert's trade routes in that direction. He then adds some more – unsubstantiated – evidence: a slave claims to have heard a secret command to 'abduction the hippogriff – on which his daughter was riding – with a strange call.

Smerdis is in a difficult position: his dwelling is the home of his royal ancestors, the Assurids, and the gem provides both its motive force and its defences. As it drifts helplessly, he is unwilling to say anything about it, and will not say where he comes from nor why he does not recover the gem himself.

Finally a rendezvous is arranged: the characters are instructed simply to show themselves and wait.

THE ASSURID DYNASTY AND THE SKY CASTLE

The first thing that occurs to anyone seeing the Sky Castle for the first time is 'How in the Nine Hells does it stay up there?' The answer is clearly 'By magic,' but surely not by mere human acrobatics. The castle, set in elegant gardens, is atop a huge mass of floating rock. This rock was once the summit of mountain, the tallest in the land, and a natural nexus with the Elemental Plane of Air. Hence, on the Prime Material Plane, it was far lighter than any rock a right to be and on the Aerial Plane its weight was an accumulation of mass. The first creatures to make use of the phenomena were djinni. They quarried it out in the rock, carried it to the surface of the planet on what correspondent to the underside of the phased area. The chamber thus formed filled with air, and was of sufficient size to create a gate between the planes. Meanwhile, Assurids – Great King and Magic of the Assurids, the people who more than fifteen centuries earlier had chosen it as the site of a great work. He had elevators constructed upon it which overlooked the caravan route. As well as forming a constant reminder of division to power to anyone passing beneath, they had a practical purpose – the windows were enchanted for scouring. By their use he then discovered the djinn palace and made contact. Assurids obtained their assistance in a project to bring warm air from the Aerial Plane to soften the harsh climate on the mountain top and form a shield which flying creatures could not penetrate. He then conceived an even more ambitious project: a tunnel which could work from the Elemental Plane of Air for the benefit of both parties. It would provide a further defence against aerial creatures such as the Dragon, a better means of weather-control, summoning warm or cool breezes so that a new residential palace could be built and surrounded by perpetual summer. This became a reality when the necessary tunnel was discovered. He had devised a method of splitting the phased rock from the mountain (leaving a sluice on which the air palace could rest), and instead used the split to create an air-filled motive power so that it could fly. Knowing that this would not please the djjini he prudently persuaded them to agree to an oath of mutual non-aggression, so long as the gem remained in the gate chamber.

When the castle rock left its maiden flight it was warded against evil spirits by the djinni, but not against theft or destruction. It fell directly in the path of the nomads, the thing was trapped, and the djinni virtual useless to them when its location no longer corresponded to their territory, and the removal of most of the phased rock left their castle unanchored, so that it required much effort to keep it stable. To placate them Assurids agreed to supply human servants (including djinni), and to give them some of the gem's power so that they could often find themselves in the reverse position.

In time the djjini became resigned to the periodic disturbances caused by the castle's wanderings. These were after all restricted by the supply problem caused by being away from its normal sources. The Assuird dynasty continued to prosper; the flying castle deterred their enemies and cowed the populace, although always more a symbol than an instrument of power. Their eventual eclipse came as much as a result of internal dissent as foreign invasion. Civil war led to some half of the royal family fleeing in the Sky Castle, whilst the other half were to prevent an incursion by desert nomads. The split led to a loss of knowledge. In the Sky Castle one was left alone who understood how to use the full powers of the gem; to support themselves they turned to banditry. Those who had fled became wanderers, and the nomads took over the bureaucracy to become ruling caste.

Some one hundred years later the scenario begins. The nomad rulers themselves have all lost control of the land, and an Adrammelech, Prince of the First Born, Shirvan, has formed a rebel army with which he has retaken one-third of the country. His position is extremely precarious. The backing of powerful relatives: his mother, whose high birth has kept him from obscurity; his brother, a fire priest, and, most importantly...
tant of all, his father-in-law, Pharnabazus, who has troops to twice the number of the rebels.

PRELUDE
The 'burgler' was that same Assurid prince who is reconquering Chyoxus. He has inherited his great-grandfather's notes on the powers of the gem, and investigation of rumour and legend convinced him that the Sky Castle still existed, although its full powers were not being used. With the most difficult part of his campaign to come (the long desert march to East Chyoxus), he felt it time to regain at least some control of the Sky Castle and its treasury.

Shirvan was unsure of his precise aims; to take over seemed good; to come to some arrangement of mutual benefit more likely, but he went alone so that he could achieve either of them bloodlessly. He hoped to attune himself to the gem, bringing its forgotten powers under control, before making himself known to his relatives and opening negotiations.

Things did not go as planned. He slipped into the castle unseen through a disused secret passage, and had begun attuning himself to the gem when he was discovered. His relatives did not prove as reasonable as he had hoped, being disinclined to listen, let alone talk, so escape became his first priority. He had taken the initial precaution of creating a zone of turbulence (see later), awaiting only his command to activate. As he broke through the door he snatched the gem and headed for the surface via the main vent (a feat only possible with the gem in his possession). Here he had another ace to play—his knowledge of hippogriff language. He called one of the castle's beasts, identifying himself as its ancestral master. However, there was a problem; the beast already had a rider, the beautiful Princess Daria. Pursuit was too close to allow her to dismount, he was not the kind of person to throw her off once they were in the air, so perforce, he stole girl as well as gem and hippogriff.

The zone of turbulence prevented further pursuit but as they flew they were watched in the Sirling Windows. However, in his unshaven state and desert clothes Shirvan looked more bandit than prince and war leader. The hippogriff could only fly at night, and in the long daylight hours Shirvan and Daria fell in love. He would have married her straightaway but, although polygamy is the custom, to wed someone of Daria's rank so soon after marriage to his first wife would be an insult to her and her father—which could have cost two-thirds of his army. Therefore he resolved to conceal Daria's existence until such time as it becomes politic to make it known.

Meanwhile the castle-dwellers were in trouble; they could no longer heat nor navigate their palace. Moreover, it was steadily drifting back toward Mount Chyoxus. The leaders, unsure what would happen next, were unwilling to hunt the thief themselves, and therefore hunted for a champion in the windows of scrying.

Navish/Prince Shirvan Assurid: ACS or 2; LVL13; HP64; Thief; Human; NG; STR: 17; INT: 13; WIS: 12; CON: 16; DEX: 16; CHA: 16; Scimitar +2; +4 Vs Aerial Creatures; Eflin Chain +3; Leather +3; Alekhine's Box. The latter is a magic item in two parts, which works in a way similar to Leomund's secret chest but is activated by a command word and holds only 1 cubic foot of matter. He has used a wish to obtain the ability to cast knock at will, three times a day.

Everyone says Shirvan's royal descent shows in every line of his bearing. He is handsome, bold and noble, just like a king out of legend. Prince Shirvan is direct heir to the throne of the Assurids. He was born in exile of an ambitious mother (herself an Assurid) and a father more interested in dancing girls than regaining his kingdom. The frustrations of ancient lineage coupled with powerlessness led to the estrangement of father and son, and Shirvan took himself off, incognito, back to the land he claimed.

During the next ten years he established himself as a bandit chieftain, after careers as burglar and a smuggler. His reputation among the populace was not bad, but to the rulers he was a scoundrel. Navish, the name he had taken, was known as one who preyed most on the foreign governors and their minions, but treated captives fairly and never killed without cause.

On his father's death Shirvan returned from voluntary exile, and with his mother made plans to retake Chyoxus. She advised his advantageous marriage, and with the experience he had of Chyoxus and his uncle's backing he raised his army. He does not love his wife, Pausania, but respects her, not least because she has already given birth to his son. He has placed the gem in his Alekhine's Box, for which only he knows the command word.

THE INFORMATION TRAIL
No positive sightings of thief, hippogriff, gem or girl are to be found before the town of Marutash.

Marutash is a town of green trees and blue waters, a place of restful gardens and entertainment. Before succumbing to its luxuries, the weary traveller from the desert must first deal with the customs post, set against the delightful background of the shanty town. Once duties are paid on gems, silks, gold, spices (and anything else a poor trader might wish to earn an honest penny from), a horde of small boys appear from the nosyone huts. They clamour to be your guide to the teahouses and the bazaar, hold your camels while you visit the temple, find a nice girl, take a message to your friends or simply beg for money. The best thing at this point is to accept the services of one and give as the first instruction the order to get rid of all the rest! Although the teahouses offer enticing refreshments, most travellers will set these aside for the more pressing necessity of the bathhouse. As is usual in this part of the world bathing is communal, although the sexes are segregated. Unless the baths are very crowded, there are ample opportunities for private conversation. Hence the more southerly of Marutash's two bathhouses is well known as little more than a house of ill repute (although business is at least conducted discreetly), and the northerly, while more respectable on the surface, provides an introduction service for merchants wishing to keep customs officers out of their affairs.

The travellers, once clean, may still be tempted by the teahouses but good sense dictates that lodgings be arranged. To avoid the discomfort of the public hostel they can send one of the ubiquitous beggar children with messages for merchant acquaintances in the town, and, although one might have no room and another may be away, someone is sure to make them welcome. The houses of the merchants are comfortable, verging on the luxurious, being set in their own walled gardens.

If the traveller has goods to sell (and why else travel?) duty requires that the next stop be the bazaar but most would, at this point, let duty go hang and give in to the siren call of the teahouses. Here they can relax in serious talk (well, gossip and tall tales), dice, and cardplay. Should they wish for anything stronger than tea one of the urchins may know a place, but it will be expensive and insalubrious - better to trust to the good offices of their host.

The bazaar is cosmopolitan and chaotic, with everyone trying to sell at profit to everyone else. Although Marutash is a small place the procession of travellers ensures a huge variety of goods on sale. And from the bazaar, across the public garden, may be seen one more essential place on the travellers' itinerary, one that cannot be neglected - the Temple of Fire, where they can give thanks for a safe journey.

The most important person in Marutash is the magistrate. He is the voice of the law and commands the customs officers and the town militia. In practice almost all of the town's officers take bribes, if they are not already immobile cripples on street corners. How- ever, aside from the genuine cases of hardship, many capitalise upon - and some even invent - their afflictions. In so doing they make more money in a day than a labourer can in a week. These earnings may be supplemented with a little thieving, but this risks severe physical penalties, and so most content themselves with selling information and running dubious errands. Naturally such a lucrative business is not without control - the self designated 'king of beggars', Mitran One Eye, employs a number of thugs to ensure that he takes a tithe of everyone's earnings.

When the PCs arrive in Marutash, armed with a picture of the thief, there is plenty of relevant information for them to discover - if they ask in the right places. This information follows in the order that makes most sense, though this may not be the order in which it is obtained.

The Leads
1. Enquiries among the beggars will quickly turn up an eye witness to the landing of a hippogriff. He will describe how two people slipped from its back and walked toward the merchants' quarter. He is not telling the whole truth. The inaccuracies in his story come to light when he claims the beast reared and struck its hoofs on the ground - hippogriffs have bird's feet at the front! When pressed to tell the truth he will admit to covering for his friend, 'blind' Hassan, who doesn't like to admit that he can see. This second beggar did see Shirvan and Daria. He can add the detail that the smaller, female figure was tenderly supported by the man, and seemed under no duress.

2. If the portrait is shown around the bazaar there is a 5% chance per day of someone identifying it as the bandit Navrish, but only a 1% chance that they have actually seen him. If shown around the beggars there is a 25% chance per day that it will be recognised by one Shamid. Shamid lies a lot. The truth is that he and Navrish were once associates in diamond smuggling. He attempted to cheat his partner, was robbed of everything as a result, and became a wandering beggar. He will attempt to make himself out to be the injured, innocent party but his story does not hold together.

Shamid can give leads on three diamond smugglers - Aban, Badghis and Cyrus - all of whom are possible contacts of the bandit Navrish. None have any current dealings with him. Aban has retired, and if the other two find out they are being investigated they will send out their 'boys' to deliver a little warning.

3. Attempts to find Navrish in the kind of dubious dives one expects to find a bandit will end in failure. Bazaar and teahouse gossip tends to give him a good press, on account of his fairness, noticeable lack of wanton cruelty, and concentration on the former rulers. Since his band has continued its activities in the east, now actively recruiting rebels, his absence had not been noticed.

At this point the players may decide to switch the subject of their search to Daria. There are various indications that a strange woman has come into a household. Give players only the names of merchants whose behaviour is suspicious; the truth behind the rumours will require further investigations, such as following them or bribing their servants.

4. In the women's bathhouse the jealousy of a wife feels when a new rival comes into the household is a favourite topic. The following merchants' wives have recently had cause to complain: Dahak, who has brought a pretty new slave into the household; Badghis who has taken in the daughter of a cousin and is genuinely trying to find her a suitable husband; and Eudoxus, who claims to have given safe haven to his nephew's widowed wife - he died in the war and she is in seclusion poor girl - but is in fact harbouring Daria.
5. Daria had no more than the clothes she stood up in when she went missing, and the following merchants have been noticed in the bazaar spending lavishly on women's clothes, cosmetics and jewellery: Eudosox, naturally; Aban who is placating his righteously jealous wife; and Cyrus, who has a new mistress.

6. There is a 5% chance per day that an innocent stranger appears to closely resemble the portrait.

7. Zazaz, attendant in the northern bathhouse, is a pervert who knows everything and will sell anything that does not compromise himself. The players should be given a strong hint of this. He is active as a middleman in the selling of smuggled diamonds. His main contact is Mamush, a customs officer, whom he had instructions to inform if anyone enquires after a hippocopriff, a girl or a man resembling Navrish. There is a 25% chance each time that he will hear of any enquiries made in the men's side of the bathhouse, 5% in the women's side, the bazaar or teahouses, and 10% if made of the beggars.

Mamush: AC 6; LVL 8; HP 41; Assassin; STR 14; INT 13; WIS 12; CON 15; DEX 16; CHA 8; +2 Scimitar, shortsword.

Mamush is employed as a customs investigator by the bureaucracy, usually working undercover. He does his job well, for the most part. His acquaintances have been driven off by the smugger, Eudosox (and thus, indirectly, Shirvan). If he places a report implicating the PCs in smuggling it will be acted upon without hesitation. Any such report will allow for the possibility of retraction without embarrassment to Mamush.

Other information may be obtained which is not of obvious relevance to the players.

8. The women in the bathhouse know a great deal about the private life of Prince Shirvan (for example, that his wife is ambitious, very jealous and rather ruthless). There is a 20% chance per day that someone will have picked up the rumour that she is displeased about his failure to properly account for his recent money making activities (he has been dividing his time between the army and the conquered province—few others have realised that there is anything wrong with this). On top of this his story is told there is an additional 20% chance that someone will know of his previous ten-year-long absence.

9. Two stories shed some light on the morals of the people of the Sky Castle.

Faruz, a merchant, had six adventurers as his quests a year ago. They showed him a roc's egg which they claimed they were to take to a mysterious patron. However, they sold it without help; this will serve as a favourable introduction.

The Army Camp (Map 3)

The information trail now leads to the army camp. This is situated 15 miles north of Marutash. The main disposition of forces is outlined in Map 3. Like all armies of the time its quota of camp-followers and hangers-on. Nonetheless it is a disciplined force, and security is good. It is worth noting the defenses against invisible infiltration. The chief of these is a pseudodragon familiar, which is most active at night; otherwise everyone, even the children, are on the watch for signs, such as the mysterious appearance of footprints or the passage of animals. If the alarm 'invisible intruder!' is given, everyone seizes sticks and begins systematically sweeping. It requires considerable agility to evade this, and all the while the army sorcerers are casting their detect spells. A far better means of obtaining information about the army is to adopt a disguise, but the tents of all important people are very well guarded against the unauthorised.

Shirvan is normally attended by guards and his entourage. A typical group of companions follows:

Cambyses: AC 3; LVL 12; HP 26 (40, with pseudodragon); Magic-User; Human; NG; STR: 12; INT: 16; WIS: 13; CON: 10; DEX: 9; CHA: 14; Bracers of Defence AC-3, +2 Dagger, Wand of Negation.

Six scimitars: AC 5; LVL 2; HP 11, 16, 20, 13, 16, 17.

As with the town useful leads may be established here.

10. Once most of the above information has been garnered, it is time to throw any theories into confusion. Shirvan is too rich in procession, to the Fire Temple to give thanks for his victories (he cannot join Pharabazus in the Holy of Holies, being a sky-worshipper). There is a 10% chance per person that the resemblance to the portrait is noticeable, rising to 50% should Shirvan speak to them.

During the procession Shirvan is attacked by an invisible stalker (see later for details), an ally of the djinn seeking the gem. If the party attempt to assist him (although he can dispatch it without help) this will serve as a favourable introduction.

The SKY CASTLE (Map 4)

The Sky Castle rests on a block of granite, some 500 yards by 400, which drifts at a height of 4800 feet. From below it has been camouflaged by hallucinatory terrain spells to resemble a cloud formation. The air shield prevents access to the surface of the rock, save for a ledge where hippogriffs land. From there tunnels lead upward to a lodge and the unidentifiable nests of the hippogriffs. Outside the lodge are beautiful gardens where exotic trees screen the single storey houses of servants and officials. At the opposite end is the palace, built in two contrasting styles, the tall stone scrying towers, and the lower residential building. The usual method of construction is mud brick on a framework of stone pillars and doorways. The whole reflects the oriental love of large-scale splendour, whereby even the kitchens and servants' rooms are enormous. Frescoes adorn the walls and the nobles' rooms are overflowing with art treasures.

CASTLE IN THE WIND

work of gold on the lowest point. Once the winds have been summoned they are directed to the appropriate gate. The wind in some of these, a massive vent for the winds of travel, and a smaller for breezes of temperature control and sound. Valves direct the wind where it is required. If the chamber is sealed airtight (as can be done) the gate can no longer be used.

The Windmills of Scrying. From these windows there are views, for one hundred miles in any direction, of the corresponding points on the planes of Fire, Earth, Water, Air, Ethereal and Shadow, as well as the Prime Material. In addition, a close up view of any location known by sight may be obtained (walls are a notable obstacle). However, it is not possible to focus on a person, creature or object.

Mechanics and Magic of the Sky Castle

The Sky Castle functions by means of an ingenious marriage of sorcery and engineering, the outline of which is given below.

The Air Shield. The original air shield of Assurus I formed a dome over the rock from its surface to a height of 600 feet. It does not cover the rear vent for the 'propulsion system' and the landing ledge. Creatures of less than 5' 6" may hit the shield, and those of more than 5' 6" to 6' 6" to do so. Within the air shield the temperature is a constant 68°F. It does not prevent the casting of spells and is negated by a Ring of Free Action.

The Gem of Many Winds. The functions of the gem fashioned by Assurus II and the djinn are as follows (an asterisk indicates powers unknown to the current inhabitants): 1. It can raise or lower the height of the rock by varying its effective density with the Elemental Plane of Air from between 10 and 90%. 2. A cool or warm breeze may be called in 1-6 rounds. A cold or hot breeze may be called in 1-6 hours. 3. A wind of travel, capable of moving the castle in 1-6 mph, may be called in 1-8 hours (it takes 5 hours to reach top speed!). 4. A zone of turbulence, 100-200yd thick, may be created outside the air shield. Any creature within the area takes 3d6 points of damage per round, and must save vs. spells each round to even move at one quarter their normal speed. This is intended to prevent the penetration of the air shield or to hover outside casting spells. Indeed, as it distorts vision, the area is used inInstance for air quality in an area. It is formed from existing winds of travel in 5-10 rounds by causing them to split and curve. Movement is not possible within the area as it may last up to 20 turns, at the end of which the wind of travel is dispersed.

The gem protects an area around it from the summoned winds. 6. When the gem is in place living creatures cannot use the gate, unless beings from both planes act together to negate the effect. 8. The area covered by the air shield may be altered.

The doors of scrying have been modified to function like giant organ pipes. Through them summoned breezes have one or two effects; firstly the paean of courage, which acts like a prayer on the defenders, and secondly the howl of terror, which causes its victims to become prostrate with fear. Creatures of 10' or less have none of those above 10HD are immune, and for all others a saving throw negates. Manipulation of the air shield can bring these effects into play individually.

The Gate Chamber (Map 5). The gate to the Plane of Air is a massive, hollow sphere in the centre of the rock. The gem is placed on a frame self. 2nd level - blur, detect magic, magic mouth, invisibility, hypnotic pattern.

Lydia is Smerdis's daughter by his first wife. She suffers greatly from her grandmother's jealousy, and although she disapproves of the King's ways, her desire to keep her living she feels powerless to prevent it.

Sassan has two acolytes, levels 3 and '0'.

Rimsid: Djinni

Rimsid is the current djinn envoy. He has a script in the Assurid camp, one of Stateate's ladies in waiting to whom he has promised three wishes for her cooperation.

In addition, there are 200 guards, 10 noble warriors, 20 other nobles, 120 free servants, 70 slaves and 80 children. A number of the guards and free servants are children of Smerdis or his father by concubines.

Sixty hippogriphs live on the landing edge and the nesting area. Only forty of these will be fit to fly at any one time. The palace treasure vault contains a number of magic items in addition to those detailed above.

PLOT DEVELOPMENT

At this stage of the scenario the players' actions will have had a great deal of influence on what happens next. However, it is likely that Shirvan will try to convince Smerdis, as captive or ambassador, and the PCs must also go there to collect their reward. If Shirvan comes as a free agent he will not do without his security, hence it looks like most prominent Sky Castle residents join his army as "honoured guests" - he hostages.

Even as a captive Shirvan holds a number of bargaining counters: only he can recover the gem from his Alekhein's Box, his understanding of its full properties is unique, and he is able to promise a share in the ancestral kingdom. Once they know his identity the Sky Assurids may well decide they would do better to enlist forces from the realm to decide how to do just to decide who concedes what.

To summarise the motives of the principal: Shirvan's most pressing need is for money - the Sky Castle is useful in war in a symbolic rather than material sense - but his most fervent desire is to marry Daria. Stateate wishes Smerdis to retain control of the Sky Castle, and, if the war is successfully prosecuted, to rule a province at the very least. However, her long-term aspirations are more far-reaching. She needs to keep her hold on the succession buttakes care that no one suspects he knows this.

Princess Lydia: AC8; LVL3; HP8; Illusionist; Human (female); LG; STR: 12; INT: 16; WIS: 12; CON: 10; DEX: 17; Cha: 7.

1st level - colour spray, detect illusion, phantasmal force, wall of fog, change of the Assurids and their palace altogether, keeping the gem and the windows for themselves.

Until discussions are concluded the reward for the characters cannot be determined, thus they are still guests when the castle ceases to drift.

ARRIVAL AT MOUNT CHYOXUS
From the moment characters arrived, it was obvious that there was something seriously wrong with the castle. The buildings were list ing slightly, the more tender of the garden plants dying, and the whole moving, very slowly, toward the flat peak of Mount Chyoxus. Shortly after everyone has arrived it reaches the mountain and slides into place with painful jolttings. Unless actually tied down, all should roll under dexterity three times and take 1-6 points of stunning damage for each failure. In addition several small trees will fall over and a large hippogriff run amok.

AERIAL ATTACK
The return to Mount Chyoxus brings the gate within djinn territory, and, with the gem absent, it is open to them. They could not attack before this since only the djinn can plane shift at will and they were too few to fight without their invisible stalker and air elementals. Their greatest problem then was not getting their forces into the Sky Castle but getting them in unseen. The Assurids, while not expecting an imminent attack, keep a close eye on the Aerial Plane through the Scrying window. However, their intelligence was limited by the number of detect invisible spells available to them — there are only Stateira’s three. She takes care that Rimsid does not know her movements, but is unaware of his spy among her ladies.

Eventually the infiltration of the aerial creatures will become known, whether because Stateira evades vigilance or the player characters are induling their curiosity. As a result the Assurids must settle their differences to defend the Sky Castle, and the djinn are forced to attack before they are ready. The battle is heralded by a dreadful noise and the djinn are forced to attack before they are ready. The battle is heralded by a dreadful noise and the castles walls start to rumble, causing all the lesser and some of the greater folk of the palace to prostrate themselves in panic, hands over their ears. There are six air elementals forcing air through the pipes of the Scrying Towers to produce the howl of terror. Immediately afterwards, bands of invisible stalkers attack any large groups of people they find still standing, which will probably include the player characters. A similar band hangs back to defend the elementals. Anyone able to detect invisible may observe that the enemy are still arriving, emerging from every duct and vent of the ‘heating system’. Stateira and Smerdis spend the first few rounds on their personal defences, and then congregate on finding out just what is going on. They are joined by Shivan for the briefest of war conferences, after which there is no need for the elementals to free the troops, whilst the latter goes to close the gate.

To do this he must operate the manual master controls to seal the chamber, as the keys are lost he must use his talent for burglary and would welcome any of the player characters who might be able to help. To assist them Stateira sends her Wand of Wonder.

Closing the Gate
The usual access to the chamber, the levitation shaft, renders it too vulnerable to its attackers. Shivan knows of another way, which he used on his initial visit. It is a disused stairway, leading off from the hippogriff tunnel. Its drawback is that it will require all his knock spells to open the three wizard-locked doors along its length.

In the Chamber, seven invisible stalkers are waiting to attack anyone who attempts to close the gate. They know something of the players do not — that the controls in the chamber can be overridden by still another set in a secret room. Three of them are guarding the entrance to this, high on the ceiling, but will join the battle if no approach is made to them. Anyone who has time to wonder what they are up to can see a tiny reflective area, this is a glasssteel-covered peephole. In the centre of the chamber an additional invisible stalker per round is coming through the gate, because of the Chamber’s size they take a further round to reach its lowest point.

Invisible Stalkers: AC: 10 (3 if can be seen); HD: 8; HP: 80, 79, 37, 31, 32, 38, 37, 31, 34, 31, 32, 38, 29, 31, 37, 39, 30, 36, 30, 27, 39 (This number should be sufficient!); Att: 4-16; invisibility, magic resistance 30%, surprise on a 1-5; N; (MM).

The Controls
The master controls appear old and rusty. There are three levers, all locked into the ‘open’ position. Each lock is trapped and a further trap operates if they are not pulled in the correct order. Each trap takes from 1-6 rounds to find and disarm. Once this is done each thief may make an intelligence check to realise that there is a further override mechanism. Once a trap has been triggered it will halve the chance that the lock may be picked.

The traps are as follows:
1. On the locks:
   a. A simple poison needle, the poison has faded, save at +4 to avoid coma.
   b. A blade sliced out at the hands. Roll under dexterity (on d20) to avoid severance and 1d10 points of damage.
2. The floor gives way slightly; make a dexterity check to avoid the feet being trapped and crushed for 2d10 points of damage.
3. On the levers:
   a. If not pulled simultaneously, water rapidly fills the chamber to a depth of ten feet.
   b. Should the players still believe these are the true master controls and pull the levers they are in for an unpleasant surprise: Rim sid, the djinn, had entered the override room before their arrival. As the sea begins to slide across the vents he pulls the override lever and the fire trap falling over and a large hippogriff running amok.

The Override Room
This is guarded by magic — the fire trap, as mentioned, and some very unpleasant glyphs filling the floor: stay living, energy drain, symbol (hopelessness) and blade barrier. Like the djinn the players may avoid these by flying.

Noble Djinni: AC: 10; HD: 12; HP: 51 (43); Att: 3-24; invisibility, create illusion, become gaseous, windwalk, form a whirlwind, grant three wishes.

Rimsid has created three illusory djinn with which to oppose the adventurers. If given enough time (1 turn) he will call a whirlwind (3d6 points of damage) with which to attack as they fly up to the secret room. If defeated he will not give up his life if he can help it, but plane-shift away.

CONCLUSION
The Sky Assurids will succeed in halting the howl of terror, thus enabling more defenders to enter the field, most of them mounted on hippocriffs. They have suffered a number of casualties but, providing no more enemy reinforcements arrive, can cope with the remainder.

Victory will bring a flood of family feeling and general goodwill which will carry Stateira and Smerdis through some amiable treaty making, and even cause them to consider a more generous reward for the player characters (after all, with Shivan observing how they keep their word they can scarcely do otherwise).

Observation in the Scrying Windows reveals the djinn in confusion. A short civil war leads to a change of leadership, and the new ruler sues for peace. They are once more allowed a share in the use of the gem and in return must supply five invisible stalkers per year to Shivan’s army (they are not having them in the Sky Castle). Once he has come terms with her parents, Shivan may return Daria to the Sky Castle, arranging to marry her as soon as his army is bigger than his father-in-law’s.

THRU THE BARBARIAN

Yes sir... Can I help you?

I want the biggest axe you've got!

Are? (Sharpening axe) I'm sorry sir. We haven't had anything like that in for a good while now sir. I'm afraid there's just no call for them at the moment you see. - well out of fashion at the moment you just can't get the parts these days. And what with the exchange rate being it is and cheap foreign imports etc etc...

so what have you got then?

Well sir. The very latest thing in is our new designer oriental range very popular sir. We have a wide selection.

Katana, Claymore Katamias, Wakizashi, Naha, etc, etc. We have the whole range. On order Sir - sorry Sir - wrong list.

Here - let's try that.

Ah... that's more like it!

Pfff!

Ah... that's more like it!

Mmm... still a bit light.

Oh no! Think I'll stick with this one. Thanks!

Well in abroad these the heaviest item we do now. I'm sure Sir. We used to do some bigger axes but to be quite honest sir they're most unpopular at the moment -- I mean they went out with flared necks. Only a few would be seen with even now.

Here, you got anything heavier?
HOW DO YOU SPELL THAT?

MITHRALL'S WONDERFUL GYRATOR
(Evocation, Alteration)
by Robert Nott
Usable by: Magic-User
Level: 6
Range: 2" +1"/level
Duration: 1 turn + 4 rounds/level
Area of Effect: One creature
Components: V,S,M
Casting Time: 6 segments
Saving Throw: Neg

This spell causes the non-living matter of two objects to merge into each other. For example, a +1 intelligent sword merged with a +4 non-intelligent sword yields a +4 intelligent sword. If a hammer is merged with a sword, the wielder may switch between the shapes of each. Note the egos of the weapons will be added.

The spell is usually cast in a darkened lead-lined room, for if the spell caster is disturbed everything within the room must save or be disintegrated (if the chamber is not lead-lined, then everything within 15" radius must save). After the casting the magic-user must rest for two days. Additionally, the magic-user will lose 1 point of constitution unless a saving throw is made. The expectation is that the spell caster will be disintegrated.

TREASURE CHEST

Treasure Chest is a regular department for readers' ideas about the AD&D game. This issue, some of the more powerful spells from the WD spell book.

BANISH SPIRIT
(Conjuration/Summoning)
by Briony Palmer
Usable by: Magic-User
Level: 7
Range: 1"/level
Duration: Permanent
Area of Effect: One creature
Components: V,S,M
Casting Time: 7 segments
Saving Throw: Neg

When cast at a creature, this spell causes it to be flung high into the air and rotate and whirl around at various speeds and directions. The saving throw is made at -2. While the spell lasts, the creature is helpless and incapable of casting spells or fighting. The magic-user is in control of the spell at all times and may make the creature rise higher or lower, or revolve faster, or whatever. If the wizard so wishes, he can make the creature revolve so fast that its body is torn apart and scattered into shreds.

DESTRUCTION
(Alteration) Reversible
by Wesley Phoa
Usable by: Clerics, Druids
Level: 8
Range: Special
Duration: Special
Area of Effect: Special
Components: V,S,M
Casting Time: 1 segment
Saving Throw: Not applicable

When cast, this spell destroys the universe. Material components include an ounce of myrrh, a fine quality (2000gp) black opal, three dead leaves from a weeping willow and seventy thousand tons of plutonium. The reverse of this spell, creation, requires six full days to cast (the spell-caster must rest for a full day afterwards) but no material components are necessary.

DELIGHT
(Evocation)
by Phil Hine
Usable by: Magic-User
Level: 7
Range: 0
Duration: 1 turn + 1 round/level
Area of Effect: One creature
Components: V,S,M
Casting Time: 1 round
Saving Throw: Halves damage

This spell creates a 3' diameter sphere of green flames. It floats ahead of the caster while the spell lasts, at a distance of up to 6'. Anything flammable within 5' of the sphere (except the caster and his gear) must make a saving throw or burst into flames for 1d6 rounds. Anything (provided it is non-magical) touched by the sphere immediately bursts into flames (no save). The sphere's touch causes 66d6 damage to living creatures. Each time something is ignited the globe emits an insane, mocking cackle. The material component is a green agate worth at least 1000gp.

impressive, being put together in the shape of a castle. New Citadel figures on display included some of the Doctor Who range, all of which are very well done. I haven’t seen all of the range ‘in the metal’, but the photographs make them look ‘excellent’ (quoth the Cyberleader). It was also interesting to see Superpower in its production livery – a far more tasteful box than the one shown in Dwarf. Inside, Albie Fiore has done a great job on the board and card designs, and what’s more, it plays well!

After surveying the bar, a quick visit to Matthew Harvey & Co revealed what was new with Tunnels & Trolls. Although the first published solo adventures available were for T&T, they failed to take off because the buyer also needed to have the T&T rule book – it took the Fighting Fantasy series to bring solo adventures complete with their own system. Now T&T has followed suit, and some of the original T&T solos (Naked Doom, Deathtrap Equaliser), as well as a few new ones, have been re-released in a format that can be played with a short version of the rules. The T&T rules are also now available in book format.

Whilst on the subject of books, someone at the bar told me that Corgi’s Dragon Warriors books are selling well as a boxed set, but disappointingly as individual books. I’m told that the distributors adopted a regional approach: Book 1 went to one part of the country, Book 2 to another part, and Book 3 elsewhere. . . . Corgi have apparently ditched these distributors, and even now a relaunch is planned.

THAT MARTINI MOMENT

Thud and Blunder ’86 will take place over the weekend of 30th May – 1st June; it is described as a ‘top class wargames weekend for experienced players or complete novices.’ As well as games brought along by attendees, D&D, Golden Heroes, RuneQuest, historic battles, Traveller, and Star Fleet Battles will be available for more details, write to: Theobalds College, Bulls Cross Ride, Waltham Cross, Herts EN7 5HW.

In the States, Tri-State Con, sponsored by Cincinnati Adventure Gamers, will take place on May 16th-19th. The convention will feature boardgames, role-playing miniatures, an auction, game dealers, and a large fantasy role-playing tournament. For more information, write to: Tri-State Con ’86, PO Box 1754, Cincinnati, OH 45231, USA.

The biggest convention this year, however, is Origins, which takes place over 3rd-6th June at the Los Angeles Airport Hilton. For more information contact: Origins ’86; PO Box 8399, Long Beach, CA 90808. A mark of the size and importance of Origins is that plans are already underway for the 1987 convention, which will take place on the Baltimore waterfront.

Role-playing is becoming increasingly popular in Europe, and in Italy a National League of Dungeon Masters has been formed. They are holding their second internationally AD&D championships, which will already have finished by the time you read this. I mention this because one of the people involved, Marcello Misirroli, is interested in trying to form a European Role-Playing Association of some sort. The idea is to take in the whole of Europe on an ‘informal’ basis – not run by manufacturers or worried about using official material, etc. If anyone is interested, write to the WD Letters page and get some discussion going!

CORPSE REVIVER

Live action role-playing is not dead! The Labyrinth Club have had plans for some while, but haven’t wanted to announce anything until they were thoroughly organised. The club has been running adventures for members only since last May, and since January in its current venue. The location is, in fact, Chislehurst Caves near Kent, the once intended location for Treasure Trap’s activities. Labyrinth would like to stress that they have no connection with TT, apart from having lost money to them! The most encouraging news about this new venture is that there is to be no one-off membership fee. You simply pay for an adventure, and this payment includes your membership fee – so if you only go once, you only pay once. What’s more, if you fancy playing the monsters then it’s actually free.

After the last hoo-ha over Chislehurst Caves, intrepid Dwarf journalists have taken the step of checking with the location’s owner and manager that all is well. And since the caves are only a few miles down the road from one of our correspondents, you’d better watch out – something loathsome could be lurking in a dark passage . . .

A RUM PUNCH

Wacky, wacky, wacky. Next issue Pete Tamlyn opens The Crazy File, the Justice Department’s record on some of the stranger crazes to hit America City One – a must for all Judge Dredd game masters! Marcus Rowland gives chase in The Cars That Ate Sanity for Call of Cthulhu, whilst Phil Masters is Spellbound! by magic in Superhero games. There are hobbits galore in the MERP and D&D adventure, and A Cast of Thousands in a revealing article about non-player characters. For new-comers to SF role-games, The Final Frontier boldly goes into the Star Trek role-playing game. 2020 Vision, Critical Mass and all our regular features round off a quite remarkable issue!

OILS

Part Two: Application

When using oils for the first time, choose a subject that has very little armour and a relatively large area of exposed flesh, such as a troll or unarmoured orc, so that you can practise blending colours to achieve realistic skin tones. As with all miniatures, the first step is to prepare the casting and prime it with a suitable undercoat; in this case a matt white enamel.

The first colour to apply is a deep shadow to all the creases and areas of heavy shade. Your orc or troll requires green skin tones, and you should use cadmium yellow and ultramarine, mixing them by adding the darker colour to the lighter one (never the other way around). If you have never used oils before, you may be tempted to mix them with your acrylics, but this must be avoided for it will ruin the bristles very quickly. Use a cocktail stick for mixing, and bear in mind that the main problem with mixing all shades is misuse of black and white. Light and delicate colours, such as yellow, white, pale browns and reds immediately turn muddy and grey if you add black. Similarly, deep reds, browns, blues and greens dull considerably if you add white. Alternative colours to black and white should be used, respectively, for darkening and lightening your base colour.

Having applied your deep shadow, now prepare a mid-tone. The mid-tone green on our orc is achieved by adding more yellow, or a lighter shade of yellow, to the basic mix. Use a medium to thinnout the paint and aim for a consistency that is fluid but not runny. Apply the mid-tone sparingly to the relevant areas of the figure, and blend it into the deep shadow tone, (which will still be wet) where the two colours meet.

Highlights come next, and should be applied as with the mid-tone - but take care to avoid contaminating the brightest highlights (tops of shoulders, bridge of nose, cheekbones, top of head, etc.) with a hint of mid-tone. With the skin completed, set aside the figure and allow it to dry.

With oils, the drying time is measured in days, not hours, but the process can be accelerated by the use of quick-drying mediums (see TTH, WD75). When the skin has dried, re-prime all clothing, teeth, eyes and armour with a matt white enamel and leave to dry. The procedure for clothing, weapons and all accessories is exactly the same as for skin tones: begin with deep shadows and work up to the highlights. For armour, try thinning some Ivory Black with turpentine and apply it like a wash. Wrap a piece of fluff-free cotton (a piece of old shirt or handkerchief will do) around the handle of a paint brush and tie it in place with cotton thread. Use this to wipe away the black oil wash from ridges before it dries; you will find that the armour is shaded by the wash, and the more you wipe it the brighter it will be the finish.

It is difficult to be precise when recommending the mixing of oil colours to achieve new shades and tones, for the possibilities seem endless. However, take care when using reds and blues for they are the most vibrant pigments and should be added in the smallest quantities. Experiment with mixing, and should you achieve a special colour that you particularly like, be sure to note the constituents and the proportions used, so that you'll be able to reconstruct it again with ease.

Two recent expansions to the ever-expanding Judge Dredd range are shown here in Figs 1 and 3. Mortis and Fire (together with Fear, not shown) form Citadel's JD6: The Dark Judges pack, which sells for £1.95. Dredd fans can look forward to a steady stream of perps, mutants, and even an Angel Gang boxed set (due for release next month).

'Scalpy Axel', featured in Fig 6, is a 90mm high, 10-piece kit, designed by Chub Pearson, and available from Barton Miniatures (BM/FAN 3: £11.40 inc p&p). This model was painted mainly in oils by Pete Wasylko, with the tarnished metal finish achieved by washing a thin oil and turpentine mix over a basic metallic enamel base coat. Note the blood dripping from the axe blade (a drop of Araldite, moulded as it hardened, before being painted with a gloss crimson enamel).

Fig 6 shows a prize-winning foursome of Citadel C15 Orco from the talented hands of Pete Benson. Note the care and attention to detail Pete has lavished on those bases, and the subtle use of yellow highlights on the basic green skin tones. Once again Tim Olsen reveals his flair for dry-brushing and black-lining in Fig 7, a Red Dragon from the Citadel DG range (DG5: £6.50). Tim recently moved from London to take over Games Workshop's Manchester store, and further examples of his work are on display at the shop.

Although not strictly a miniature in the true sense, the model featured in Fig 8 illustrates what good figure painting can achieve. Adrian Bay's 'Yoda' started out as a nondescript plastic model from the Star Wars range and was transformed into a work of art by careful dry-brushing with acrylic and enamel paints.

18 months, with the first knockouts usually starting after six months. Each player is either a king of a fantasy race or a powerful charismatic character. You can recruit trolls, wildmen and control powerful creatures such as dragons. Your characters will capture and control cities, upon which you can spend gold to improve security, workshop production, defences, and maintain and enlarge your army. With gold, your wizards undertake magical research. Spies search out enemy strongholds and their attempt acts of sabotage, theft and assassination. These are just a few options available to a player in Earthwood.

Earthwood is computer moderated but the turn sheets and replies are written in plain English. No need to look through complex charts and code books to understand this game.

Yes! Citadel's new range of Dr Who Miniatures boasts Doctors, Time Lords, Ice Warriors and Daleks with a further promise of more to come at an advanced point of the current spatio-temporal continuum. All good news for devotees of the famous time traveller, players of the splendid role-playing game from FASA and, of course, loonies with a thing about telephone boxes. Dr Who Miniatures are in your shops now, look out for the special blister cards.

The Doctor Who role-playing game from FASA is a meticulously researched and carefully produced game bringing together the entire Dr Who mythos for novice Time Lords. Copiously illustrated throughout with stills from the TV series as well as attractive line drawings, this game has already proven a winner with serious role-players and Dr Who fans alike.

- The Players Manual. Giving rules for character creation, skill use, abilities, and a complete combat system. A glossary of game terms is thoughtfully provided.

- Games Operations Manual. Tells you how to set up games and present your adventures. Demonstrates the creation of non-player characters, villains, new worlds and alien creatures. Gives full rules for governing the players, time travel and use of special equipment.

- Sourcebook for Field Operatives. Provides a fascinating Time Travellers' Handbook, the informative Tardis Operator's Manual, indispensable Visitors Guide to Gallifrey, description of the various equipment and thorough background information on The Doctor, his companions, The Master, Daleks, Cybermen, Sontarans, etc....

Choose your weapons . . .
and your armor, and your shield. You’re ready to fight it out —

MAN to MAN

Steve Jackson, designer of Car Wars, Ogre/G.E.V., and Illuminati, now brings you the fantasy combat system from GURPS — his upcoming Generic Universal RolePlaying System. Man to Man is an exciting, highly realistic game of medieval combat. Design your own fighter — swordsman, archer, martial artist, fencer — exactly the character you want. Then fight it out in the arena against your opponents. If you survive, you’ll improve your skills and abilities — if you survive . . .

Man to Man is a smooth-playing boardgame, and you can use it as a realistic combat system for any fantasy or medieval roleplaying game. Special rules let you create elves, dwarves, halflings, reptile men, and the other nonhuman warriors of high fantasy.

80-page rulebook, including 20-page pull-out section of maps, charts, and pregenerated fighter characters, plus Cardboard Heroes® miniatures.

Orcslayer is the first Man to Man supplement. Four new maps, new rules, non-human characters, and nine full-scale scenarios to play as separate combats, or link to form one long-playing adventure. And Orcslayer includes the Reaction Table from GURPS.

48-page book, including 20-page pull-out section of maps, charts, and 15 pregenerated characters.

McDeath is the latest Campaign Supplement for the Warhammer game from Citadel. Warhammer author Richard Halliwell invites you to the coast of East Albion, where the evil, sadistic and thoroughly unpleasant McDeath has murdered the rightful King Dunco and usurped his throne. But, in the spirit of great tragedy, the forces of justice are gathered to do battle against McDeath and his depraved minions. Orcs, Men, Dwarfs and Treemen fight it out in a titanic struggle for power, money and alcohol.

McDeath comes boxed with full-colour artwork by John Blanche and comprises of:

- Campaign book detailing each of the four battles to be fought: Winwood harbour, Loch Lorn, Dungal Hill and Runsinane Castle. Each battle is thoroughly described for the benefit of the gamesmaster, including maps, how to set up the scenery, run the games, allocate victory points, etc.

- Card buildings representing those required during the campaign. These are easy to assemble models designed by award-winning scene modeller David Andrews and are completely compatible with Citadel's existing campaign and village packs.

- Full-colour castle floor plans representing Runsinane castle and used as a playing board during the final decisive battle of the campaign.

- Full-colour campaign map illustrating the area of East Albion.

- Command sheets for the players involved. Sheets give stats and objectives for each player and obviate the need for tedious record keeping or endless explanation before play can begin.

- Card counters are also provided for the various forces involved.
