WARHAMMER 40,000

ASSAULT ON BLACK REACH
Amidst the shattered ruins of Black Reach, the valiant Ultramarines fight the barbaric Orks.
The White Dwarf bunker has become a hotbed of high-octane hobby just lately, and there's no sign of it slowing!

Recently we were forced by the Studio slave-masters to leave our dingy bunker and move to a nicer, brighter, bigger area. Now, being a bit set in our ways, we didn't take kindly to the move, but something rather good has come out of it (even better than the aforementioned nicer, brighter, bigger office). While we were moving we unearthed our respective stashes of miniatures and half-finished projects. And we now have enough light to paint! So, each lunchtime, every member of the team has either been busily painting their models or playing lots of games. Excellent! I'm currently litting from one project to the next, as I'm wont to do, frenzically trying to get my RealKild Empire army finished, while at the same time trying to put a Space Marine army together so I can join in the current 40K frenzy. It's a hard life.

On the gaming front, the battle report that you'll find in this issue was fought in the Studio yesterday (at the time of writing, of course. By the time you read this, it'll have been several months ago. Weird, eh?), and we all got very excited about it. We were using the models from the new Assault on Black Reach set, and it gave me the same buzz that I got when I first lifted the lid off my 2nd edition Warhammer 40,000 box set when I was a lad (cue nostalgia trip). If there's one true constant in every hobbyist's life, it's the joy of opening a big boxed game full of miniatures. It's what got me hooked all those years ago, and it still gets me fired up now. I was getting down to a model's eye view of the battle and thinking "Good lord, that Warboss/Dreadnought/Space Marine (delete as applicable) is incredible! The things they can do with plastic these days." It got me thinking that many people, even some of you reading this, will be experiencing the excitement of a boxed game for the very first time with Assault on Black Reach, and then in five, ten or even twenty years they'll be thinking about the latest version of a boxed game that I'm thinking now. For the veterans out there, turn to page 14 to see what I mean about Assault on Black Reach - I defy anyone to say that it's not the best 40K set we've ever done. For the newbies: welcome aboard. I'm sure the future of the hobby is in safe hands.

WARHAMMER ARMIES: WARRIORS OF CHAOS

A few issues back, you may remember that we featured a Warriors of Chaos army list to get you by while Phil Kelly slaved away on the new army book. Well, that work is very nearly finished and November will see the Chaos Warriors march southwards once more, resurgent and ready for war.

The men of the north are the scourges of the Old World for they want nothing more than to tear down order and destroy the civilised realms. At the heart of their armies are the Chaos Warriors, merciless killers clad in hell-forged suits of Chaos armour. These indomitable soldiers march to war alongside the savage tribes from which they originated, great hordes of brutal northmen, ready to do anything in service to their capricious and thirsting deities.

Phil Kelly has been hard at work communing with the Dark Gods to get the book finished on time. Those few people that have seen its pages gibber incoherently about such things as Chaos Warshires, Forsaken, Troll Kings and the coming of Sigvald, whatever that means. Only time (and WD347) will reveal the true meaning.

To accompany the new army book, the Citadel forges have been manufacturing brand new miniatures at a bewildering rate. Come November, expect to see new plastic Marauder Horsemen, Chaos Knights and Chaos Warhounds, not to mention a range of stunning metal characters, including the Chaos Lord shown on the right.

OUT NOVEMBER 1ST

This new Chaos Lord by Mike Anderson gives you a taste of what to expect with the Warriors of Chaos release.

The Marauder Horsemen are just one of the brilliant new plastic kits being released in November.

In Battle March it's not just the massed units of troops you'll be commanding - Heroes and Champions will also be ready to do your bidding. They can learn new tactics, unlock abilities, command larger units, and fight in duels to the death.

Now is the time to take up arms - the world is yours to conquer!
School League 2009

Following a great summer of 40K, and having gotten over the shock of returning to school, it's time to start thinking about the coming year of gaming, and that can mean only one thing; the School League 2009!

With the arrival of a brand new edition of Warhammer 40,000 and the amazing new Assault on Black Reach box set, this year’s School League will be a truly memorable event as school teams tackle the new rules as well as one another, not to mention Warhammer and The Lord of the Rings. Even now, many schools across the land are putting their teams and armies together to compete in this season’s League.

For details of how you can enter your school into this year’s national School League, get your teacher to contact our Community Coordinator, Bek Hawkby on 0115 900 4821 for an information pack.

All of our stores are standing by to run School League activities in the store to help you prepare for the Regional and National finals. These activities include painting and tactical advice, as well as opportunities to make scenery or have a club tournament. If you wish to arrange a visit and get the most out of your local store, contact Bek and she will help you set it up - we can even put you in touch with other local school and library clubs whom you can play against.

Who Spilled My Pint!

Joseph Bugman can get very upset if anyone spills a drop of his famous XXXXXX brew. By the looks of this new miniature, sculpted by Aly Morrison, the Master Brewer has had his pint knocked over by some clumsy young beardless and is out for revenge, and the chance of a good grumble...

This fantastic new model is available for sale only in Bugman’s Bar at Warhammer World, priced £10.00, and comes with a barstool and an axe. So next time you come to take a look at the world-famous Citadel Miniatures Hall, join in on one of our gaming events, or visit the displays of original illustrations and artwork, drop by the bar; but keep a firm grip on your beer!
ASSAULT ON BLACK REACH

It is an age of darkness, superstition and relentless dogma. The Imperium of Man commands the greatest stellar empire the galaxy has ever seen; yet the technology on which it is founded is from a forgotten age, the knowledge of its manufacture lost to humanity. Nevertheless, the Imperium endures, its outposts spanning a million worlds; its laws and creeds governing souls beyond counting, the vast majority of which remain blissfully ignorant to the true horrors of the universe, for in the cold reaches of space, Mankind is not alone.

With the advent of the Warp drive, humanity rapidly expanded across the galaxy. As Man spread to new worlds, it encountered alien races and fought its first battles under strange skies. Even now, thousands upon thousands of years later, the enemies of Man stand ready to destroy everything the Cod-Emperor of Mankind has created. Orks wage war for war's own sake, while Necrons and Tyranids scour loyal systems clear of life. The upstart Tau press upon the Imperium's boundaries, while the enigmatic Eldar middle from afar. Yet even these foes are nothing to what awaits the weak-willed and corrupt beyond the veil of the material universe — in the Warp itself, Daemons lurk.

Though the Imperium is surrounded on all sides — by the alien, the Daemon and the traitor — it persists. The superhuman Space Marines and innumerable might of the Imperial Guard are but two of the many agencies dedicated to Mankind's defence, combating the encroaching darkness with faith, courage and fire. Still, the myriad foes of humanity close in, and the Imperium feels each lost planet and system ever more keenly. Night is descending on Mankind as the Time of Ending closes in.

In the grim darkness of the far future there is no peace, no respite, no forgiveness. There is only war.
The recent relaunch of Warhammer 40,000 caused a massive buzz in the gaming community, but the release of Assault on Black Reach has raised anticipation to record levels. Andy Hall explains.

Warhammer 40,000 is now in its 5th incarnation, and the game is bigger, better and more playable than ever. If this is your first look at White Dwarf (where have you been?), then you will have realised by now that Warhammer 40,000 differs from normal games. There are unlimited possibilities and players must be prepared to expend time and effort collecting, assembling and painting their models before fielding them on the tabletop for an exciting battle.

Creating the spectacle of a fully painted army is an accomplishment you can be rightfully proud of. Once you’ve taken part in a tightly contested battle between painted miniatures across fully modelled terrain, you’ll be hooked.

Those of you familiar with 40K will have already had a good few months playing the latest edition of the rules. Early feedback we’ve received here at the White Dwarf bunkers is that it’s the best incarnation of the game yet, with the new rules adding to the challenge without sacrificing the game we know and love. Now your warriors can advance more quickly, go to ground, make off-table flanking manoeuvres, and tanks can (finally!) ram other vehicles. Close assaults will be more brutal, but missions are more objective-based so it’s not just about pummelling your foe — although that will certainly help.

Lifting the Lid
There’s no denying that working on White Dwarf is cool, but it’s far from the bohemian, languid lifestyle some people tend to assume (the number of times people have said to me “But you spend all day playing games!”...). In fact, working on a monthly magazine is hard work, but there are times when it’s undoubtedly one of the best jobs in the world, and this is one of them, as I got to open one of the very first copies of Assault on Black Reach off the production line. Oblivious to the jealous stares from my colleagues, I delved in.

Before tearing off the shrink-wrap, I always like to hold a new game aloft for a few seconds to feel how weighty it is. In the case of Black Reach, the “weight test” was passed with flying colours — without even looking at the contents list I could tell the box was going to be bursting with hobby goodness. With this ritual out of the way, it’s straight into the game itself. As I lifted the lid, I savoured the satisfying “thump” sound of the box sliding open, and the wafts of that wonderful “new game smell.” Once I’d removed the lid, I was greeted by four of the most packed frames of plastic miniatures I’d ever seen (more on those overleaf).

Taking the frames out of the box, I uncovered the game’s many other components that were initially obscured by the sheer amount of grey plastic! In fact, there are 46 models in the box, including a Dreadnought and three Deffkoptas. If that doesn’t represent great value and the perfect excuse to start playing the latest edition of Warhammer 40,000, then I don’t know what does. So, let’s take a look at the components in detail...

FREE CITADEL MINIATURES!

You may have noticed that your issue of White Dwarf was lumper than usual. This is because there’s a free plastic frame containing an Ork Nob and a Space Marine Terminator attached to the cover. Both models are from Assault on Black Reach. To find out how to assemble and paint your new models turn to page 88.

The Boxed Game
The Assault on Black Reach boxed game has everything you need to start playing. It contains a handy pocket-sized rulebook, a starter booklet and enough dice and Citadel miniatures to get you wargaming straight away. If you don’t believe us, just check out the contents over the page.

The Rulebook
Also available is the Warhammer 40,000 rulebook. This massive hardback tome consists of 320 pages of 40K hobby lore. It contains all the rules needed to play, a massive background section documenting the Warhammer 40,000 galaxy, and is crammed full of ideas on creating your own missions, playing campaigns and building battlefields.
INSIDE THE BOX

The contents of Assault on Black Reach. Yes, you get all this in one £40 box set – we can’t quite believe it either.
Box Contents

A. Range rulers
   Perfect for measuring distances if you haven't got a tape measure handy.

B. Dice
   You get plenty of these in the box, as you need them to determine many things in 40K, such as shooting and fighting. The scatter dice is used to determine if barrage and blast weapons will scatter or remain on target.

C. Transfer Sheet
   This transfer sheet has both Orc and Space Marine symbols, allowing you to add details to your models.

D. Templates
   The templates included with the game follow the style and colour that'll already be familiar to most 40K players. The vibrant green gives them a distinctive and eye-catching Warhammer 40,000 look.

E. Starter Booklet
   This booklet is a great starting place, whether you're a beginner or a veteran. The booklet provides assembly and painting advice, tips for setting up and playing your first game using the Black Reach miniatures, and over 10 pages of background information, giving you a solid grounding in all things Warhammer 40,000.

F. Rulebook
   This handy-sized rulebook is a perfect gaming companion, and great to have close by during a battle for easy references. Don't mistake the smaller size for cut-down rules, though – this rulebook contains the complete rules section from the latest edition, so it's all you'll need during a game.

G. Miniatures
   The boxed game is full to bursting with brand new Citadel miniatures:
   - Space Marines:
     - 1 Space Marine Captain
     - 10 Tactical Space Marines
     - 5 Space Marine Terminators
     - 1 Space Marine Dreadnought
   - Orcs:
     - 1 Ork Wurros
     - 20 Ork Bovz
     - 5 Ork Nobz
     - 3 Ork Doffkoplas
SPACE MARINE TACTICAL SQUAD

Tactical Squads are the backbone of the Space Marine army. They are called upon to fulfil the full range of battlefield roles – holding ground, claiming strategic objectives, providing fire support or charging into the bloody melee of combat all fall within the remit of a Tactical Squad. The box contains a full squad of 10 plastic Tactical Marines.

SPACE MARINE DREADNOUGHT

A Dreadnought is a massive machine, weighing several tons and standing higher than even a Terminator, the tomb for an honoured Chapter hero who refuses to die. As it strides into battle it shrugs off enemy fire whilst wielding its own deadly weapons to great effect. The Dreadnought in Assault on Black Reach is unique to the boxed game, so if you already have one in your collection, this one won’t look identical to it.

Space Marines

A thousand Chapters of a thousand men – a million Space Marines are all that stands between Mankind and damnation. Space Marines are superhuman warriors, their bodies made superior in all respects to a normal man by a harsh regime of genetic modification, psycho-conditioning and arduous training. They are adept at all forms of combat and are very hard to kill, thanks to their modified constitution and the generations-old power armour they wear to battle. Though a Space Marine army will nearly always be outnumbered by their foe, each battle-brother is worth two or three enemies, whether in a furious firefight or a bloody close assault.

Most Space Marine Chapters follow the Codex Astartes, a code of rigid doctrines that form the make up and disposition of the Chapter.

So, just how did the Citadel Design Team cram so much on to the four large Assault on Black Reach plastic frames? Ted Williams, affable Runtherd and Citadel Design Team manager, was only too happy to explain. He also brought along the primary designers of the Black Reach set, Dave Thomas and Seb Perbet.

"Quite simply, we wanted to get as much 40K in the box as we possibly could," begins Ted. "From the very start of the project it has always been about upping the miniature count wherever we possibly could."

Of course, it wasn’t quite as straightforward as that. If it had been about the number of miniatures alone, they would have just crammed the box full of Gretchin. "What we wanted to do was provide players with two complete, viable forces. So it couldn’t be a few squads of the same troop type; we had to have HQ choices, Troops, Elite squads, and so on in the box as well," says Dave.

The first decision was to choose the races to go into the box. Admittedly, Space Marines were always going to be in the frame (Less of the bad puns, Hal! – Ed) as they are the iconic race that have been in every Warhammer 40,000 boxed game we’ve ever produced. The Orks were the next logical choice – not only did they a recently released Codex to expand on, but it fit rather well with the Black Reach story in the rulebook. It was also a welcome return for the Orks to “boxed game status,” as they were one of the starting forces in the first Warhammer 40,000 boxed game, before being ousted by the Dark Eldar in 3rd edition and the massed swarms of Tyranids in the previous Battle for Macragge boxed game.
SPACt MARINE CAPTAIN

Space Marine forces are led to war by Captains, warriors and leaders who are the epitome of honour and courage on the battlefield. The Space Marine Captain excels at both ranged combat and the fury of close assault. The model is armed with a bolgun, so he can add his fire to the fusillade from his brother Space Marines, while the power sword and high number of Attacks means he can cleave his way through Ork Boyz with ease.

SPACt MARINE TERMINATORS

The 1st Company of a Chapter consists of the veterans, the elite of the elite, and the boxed game contains five of these mighty warriors. For a Space Marine to join the 1st Company he will have won renown on battlefields across the galaxy. To become accepted into the 1st Company is the highest honour for a Space Marine.

Once the races had been set, choosing which models actually went into the game then had to be decided. "That process went back and forth over a long period of time," says Ted. "We had quite a long wish list to begin with, but this was refined as the development process went on. The difficult bit was making sure you not only had complete forces for each race, but that they remained balanced as well."

Two of the things on the wish list Ted mentioned above were the Dreadnought and the Deifkopas. "I was very keen to get a Dreadnought in," says Dave. "It would have been easier to choose something else but the objective was to make the best boxed game we’ve ever done, so we had to find a way to squeeze it in." To do this, Dave took the original plastic Dreadnought and reduced it down to a mere seven components. Thanks to some very clever

Terminator Honours

Only the elite veteran Space Marines of a Chapter’s revered 1st Company may wear Terminator armour, also known as Tactical Dreadnought armour. Stills of Terminator armour are incredibly powerful and, as such, are amongst a Chapter’s most prized relics.

When committed to the field of battle, a Space Marine Terminator is nigh on unstoppable. Bullets and las blasts glance harmlessly off the thick plated plates, while a Terminator’s storm bolter and power fist can slay the enemy at both range and in hand to hand combat.
Orks

Orks are a barbaric and warlike race that live only to fight. An Ork army is a vast horde of green-skinned brutes clad in primitive armour and wielding crude but effective weapons. Orks win through sheer weight of numbers, swiftly overwhelming a more disciplined enemy army in an endless tide. In fact, should all of Ork-kind band together they would surely take over the galaxy. Luckily, Orky nature means they are equally happy fighting amongst themselves as they are against other races. Because of this single-minded, warlike obsession it would be easy to write off the Orks as a mere nuisance, but it is a foolish commander that would do so. A mob of charging Orks is a devastating sight and should they reach their enemy they will tear them apart in a flurry of brutal blows. Greenskin come in all shapes and sizes, from the lanky Grots to massive, hulking Warbosses.

ORK WARBOSS

The Ork Warboss is the largest and toughest greenskin in the horde, able to boss and bully his Boyz into battle through sheer bloody-mindedness and brutal use of violence. The Warboss excels in close combat, his power klaw ensuring that even power armour won’t stop him from butchering the enemy, and his place is in the thick of it. Leading Ork Nobz and hordes of Boyz into battle.

ORK BOYZ

The vast majority of Orks are known as Boyz. They are the core of any Ork force. They are tough determined warriors who fall upon the enemy in a tide of violence. Assault on Black Reach contains a large mob of 20 Boyz, with interchangeable arms and heads.

moulding solutions the only distinguishable difference between the Black Reach Dreadnought and the plastic kit is a slightly smaller power plant. “I’ve added some extra details to the legs, and you now get a plastic multi-melta as well, which was the missing option from the kit,” adds Dave.

Whilst Dave was charged with the Space Marines, Seb Perret, who was fresh from the recent Ork releases, was tasked with the Black Reach greenskins. The Deffkoptas immediately stand out – not only because they’re a totally new design, but also because you get not one, but three of them in the game. “I started off using the Ork Warbikes as a basis,” says Seb. “I thought about how the Orks themselves would have developed them, most probably by an enterprising Mek adding a set of rotor blades to a nearby Warbike to see what would happen.”

As well as the Ork Boyz and Nobz, Seb also designed the Warboss shown above. Both he and Dave really enjoyed designing the characters. “Doing a plastic character model is always quite a challenge because you need to consider all the different weapon and equipment options you have to include,” says Seb. “But, as we’d already determined what weapons the Warboss and Captain were going to be armed with, we could pose the models to accentuate these choices and not worry that while a sword arm looks cool outstretched, it would look silly for a plasma pistol. So, that was really freeing and interesting for us as sculptors.”

Despite the knowledge imparted by Ted and the designers so far, I still find myself at a loss to my original question as to how they physically got so much stuff onto the frames. “With the four frames you get in
ORK DEFFKOPTAS
The Deffkopta was the result of decades of experimentation, although some would argue that the tinkering of the Meks still continues to this day, as no two Deffkoptas are ever the same. Deffkoptas are usually armed with rokkit launchas but they have been known to carry massive buzzsaw-like weapons for close-range attacks. The boxed game includes three of these dangerous vehicles.

ORK NOBZ
Ork leaders are called Nobz, but becoming a Nob isn’t some pre-ordained birthright, but rather a virtue of these Orks being bigger, scarer and more belligerent than the other Orks around them. There are five of these bulking elites in the box.

Assault on Black Reach, the obvious thing to do was to put the Ork forces on two frames and the Space Marines on the other two,” answers Ted. “While that’s neat, it’s not the best use of space so we’ve designed the frames to make optimum use of the limited room in the box. It was a difficult and time-consuming process. We even took into account how the frames would stack and the space that would gain us. We made some ruthless decisions; it came down to really micro-managing the frame makeup, right down to things like splitting the Deffkopta blades in half to save a few cubic centimetres. This really pushed our plastic mould technicians to the limits of what they can do with injection moulding – to their credit they really kept up with our demands. So much so that we’re very pleased with the end result,” Ted concludes.

Black Reach is Coming
Two months after the invasion of Waaagh! Zanzag, salvation came to the embattled world of Black Reach. Captain Sciaras led a contingent of Ultramarines into the maw of the greenskin horde. Their objective: to slay Ork Warlord Zanzag and halt the Waaagh! in its tracks.
Will Captain Sciaras succeed, or will the sheer mass of Orks overwhelm the Emperor’s finest? You can help decide by playing out the campaign that starts on page 52. Following that, there’s a full battle report so you can see how veteran Space Marine commander Matt Husson fares against long-time rival, Ork Warlord Phil Kelly.

With miniatures for five new Good Heroes released this month for The Lord of the Rings strategy battle game, we thought it would be a good time to look at them in depth. Mark Latham gatecrashes Elrond’s secret council to find out more.

This latest set of releases for The Lord of the Rings signals the start of something quite exciting here in the Games Workshop Studio. For a while now the Citadel designers have been working on all sorts of projects that weren’t destined for imminent release. Some of these models have already been earmarked for the Collectors Range, but others were set aside for a rainy day...

A travesty for such excellent models to languish in the depths of the Studio! So instead, the clever chaps who are in charge of such esoteric delights as schedules and spreadsheets have come up with a plan of sorts – a plan that means all these treasures will get released on a fairly regular basis, to surprise and delight us all. There’s no serious method to this madness, just a desire to let the Citadel designers sculpt some cool miniatures, and then release them as soon as possible.

This means that there will be many more surprises in store for all of our games systems over the coming months and years, but we’re starting with new miniatures for The Lord of the Rings strategy battle game, of Gandalf, Elrond, Legolas, Aragorn and Gimli. As all of these mighty Heroes were key players at the Council of Elrond, we thought that their release would make an excellent excuse to revisit that particular scene from The Fellowship of The Ring film and book, and take a look at the delegates and their forces, and what parts they played in The War of The Ring.

Of course, far be it for me to speak with authority on matters Middle-earth. Instead, I’ve drafted in Mat Ward to tell us about the history of the protagonists and their kin, and to present the rules for all five of the new miniatures. On top of that, Mat has written us not one, but two new scenarios featuring these awe-inspiring Heroes.

Elrond's inner circle of counsellors comprises some of the wisest beings in all of Middle-earth. All have tested their wit and might against the Dark Lord, Sauron, and some can even claim to have opposed the dread Morgoth whose black evil eclipsed even that of the Lord of Mordor. In these dark days, Elrond's list of allies has grown thin. Sauron knows well who his chief enemies are and does not suffer them to live a moment longer than can be avoided. Where Elrond could once perhaps have called upon five Wizards for counsel, now there are only two he can trust. Great scholars and loremasters could once be found in Armor and Eregion, but now both of those realms are gone, snuffed out by the Dark Lord's evil. Many have fallen opposing Sauron, but others endure to continue the fight, and their will is still sufficient for the task ahead.

Of course, a creature of wisdom may still be a formidable warrior. The individuals that stand at the heart of Elrond's council are truly fearsome opponents. First of all, there is Elrond himself, an Elf steeped in the blood of countless slain Orcs and who has survived some of the bleakest times to beset Middle-earth. Second in power to Elrond comes Gandalf the Grey, probably Elrond’s closest ally on the council and the only being to rival the master of Rivendell’s knowledge. Finally we have Glorfindel and Estelmar, Elders of special note. Glorfindel in particular is known to have cowed even the dread Witch-king of Angmar – he is surely terror incarnate to Sauron’s lesser servants. Such individuals are worthy additions to any The Lord of the Rings army, sure to prove their value against all manner of Evil creatures.

Elrond, Master of Rivendell (Elf) ........................................205 points

In the later days of the Third Age, Elrond is chiefly a loremaster and counsellor to the Free Peoples, having forsaken the chaos of battle for a subtler role. His haven of Imladris, known more widely as Rivendell, is the last lonely house east of the sea. Here weary travellers of good heart may set aside their burdens amid tranquillity and seek guidance from the very wisest of the wise. Servants of Sauron should be beware, however; Elrond may have set aside his blade, but he is more than prepared to take it up once again should evil creatures threaten his home or allies.

Legions of Middle-earth
Elrond, Master of Rivendell, may be fielded as part of a Rivendell army. Your force can only include one Elrond.

Wargear
Elrond carries an Elven blade.

Vilya: Thanks to the power of Vilya, one of the three Elven Rings, Elrond can re-roll his dice using Fate points.

Special Rules
Woodland Creature, Lineage of the Firstborn.

Foresight of the Eldar: Before the game begins, roll a D6 and make a note of the result – these are Elrond’s “foresight points” for the coming battle. Elrond may spend these foresight points during the Priority phase, after both players have made their priority rolls. For each foresight point expended, Elrond may alter the Good side’s priority roll by +1 or -1. Elrond’s foresight may not be used to reduce the priority roll below one, or increase it beyond six.

Magical Powers
Wrath of Bruinen: Dice score to use: 4+. This spell affects all enemies within 6/14cm of Elrond – but only one foe can attempt to resist it. If resisted, all foes are unaffected; if the foe fails to resist, then all are affected. All enemies within 6/14cm are knocked to the ground. Cavalry models are automatically thrown – both steed and rider are knocked to the ground. All affected models then suffer a Strength 2 hit, or a Strength 8 hit if they are in a stream, river or other similar terrain feature.

Renew: Dice score to use: 3+. See the main rules manual for more details.
Gandalf the Grey (Wizard) ...................................................... 170 points

Of the Order of Wizards, Gandalf the Grey is second only to Saruman the White in power. It is Gandalf who leads The Fellowship until his fall in Moria at the hands of the fearsome Balrog. Gandalf's magical abilities are a great asset to The Fellowship, though he is also able to hold his own in a fight.

Narya: Thanks to the power of Narya, the Ring of Fire, one of the three Elven Rings, Gandalf can re-roll his dice when using Fate points.

Glamdring: Glamdring is a magical sword. When Gandalf fights with Glamdring (rather than his staff), he adds +1 to his Strength characteristic, giving him a Strength value of 5.

Glorfindel
Whether armoured or unarmoured, Glorfindel is a truly formidable fighter. He is as capable of hacking through a Goblin horde as he is of cutting down a Ringwraith, and can make the difference between a good army and a great one!

Erestor
An inexpensive Hero, Erestor is nonetheless worth every point. While your opponent is focused on neutralising or killing your more expensive Heroes, Erestor can carve up enemy Captains and banner bearers with impunity.

Lords of the West
The Rangers of the North

The once-proud land of Arnor may lie in ruins, but its legacy continues. There are strong ties between the house of Elrond and the remnant houses of Arnor, bonds of blood and comradeship forged in a long battle against a common foe. Of all the many races and kingdoms of Men in Middle-earth, it is only these sundered heirs of Isildur that Elrond truly trusts.

As the Elves have dwindled, their sight of many places has become clouded by ignorance. They must trust to others to walk those wild paths. The Rangers of Arnor are Elrond’s eyes and ears in the wild lands of the north. Through their valour the Master of Rivendell is kept apprised of the rise and fall of Orc warbands and maddened Trolls, threats not only to Rivendell but to all that dwell in northern Eriador. Aragorn’s seat at the Council of Elrond is not solely earned through the kingship of Gondor that will one day be his, but because of his chieftainship of the Dúnedain of Arnor, and his people’s close alliance with Rivendell.

As would be expected of warriors who spend much of their lives in the wild, the Rangers are hardened fighters, equally deadly with sword or with bow. So respected are they by the Elves, that several of Elrond’s household – most famously his sons, Elladan and Elrohir – have forsworn the safety of Rivendell to join the Rangers of the North in their wardship of the untamed lands.

Rangers of Arnor typically wear natural shades, the better to merge with their environment. Some, however, still bear the colours of Arnor’s noble houses, preserving their memory and traditions for that day when the kingdom is reborn.

Aragorn, Isildur’s Heir (Man) .................................200 points

Aragorn, also known as Strider, is a descendant of Elendil and the last heir to the throne of Gondor. His rough and weather-hewn appearance speaks of a hard life spent battling evil in wild places. Aragorn becomes the protector of the Hobbits and the greatest of the heroes of The Fellowship. His fate and that of the Ringbearer are inexorably bound together with the fate of Middle-earth itself.

Legions of Middle-earth

Aragorn, Isildur’s Heir, may be fielded as part of a Grey Company army. Your force can only include one Aragorn.

Wargear

Aragorn wears armour. He carries a sword (hand weapon) and a bow. At an additional points cost, Aragorn can be given the following:

Elven cloak .........................................................10 pts

Special Rules

Mighty Hero: Aragorn, Isildur’s Heir, is a mighty hero. He may expend 1 Might per turn without reducing his Might store. Any additional points of Might expended during his turn will reduce his Might store as normal.

Chieftain of Forgotten Arnor. Aragorn, Isildur’s Heir, is a figure of great authority and renown amongst the Dúnedain. His mere presence is enough to alter the tides of battle, inspiring his kin and followers to ever-greater achievements. Rangers of Arnor, Rangers of the North, Dúnedain and the Heroes Legolas, Gimli, Halbarad, Elladan and Elrohir all count as being in range of a banner if Aragorn, Isildur’s Heir, is within 3'88cm.

Master of the Wilderness. Aragorn, Isildur’s Heir, may move through difficult terrain without penalty, as may Rangers of Arnor, Rangers of the North, Dúnedain and the Heroes Legolas, Gimli, Halbarad, Elladan and Elrohir, if they are on foot and within 6'/14cm of Aragorn.

28 WHITE DWARF THE COUNCIL OF ELROND
Heroes of the Northern Wilds

Halbarad
Halbarad's fighting skills may pale beside those of Aragorn, but by any other standards he is mighty indeed. Whether you choose to have Halbarad provide backup to Aragorn, or lead an army in his own right, this Dúnedain chieftain will not disappoint.

Elladan and Elrohir
Whether used offensively, defensively or as a mixture of both, the Elven twins never fail to cause a headache for your opponent. They are best used as a team, where the potency of their special attacks really come into their own.

Arathorn
Arathorn is a bold and effective leader for any force of Rangers of the North. Though in reality he was slain long before Aragorn came of age, father and son make a remarkably effective pairing on the battlefield.

Additional information about the Rangers of Armor can be found in the Ruin of Armor supplement.

Ranger Bands of the North

Though it is impossible for them to maintain strict uniforms, each Ranger Band favours a sense of shared identity, often shown in the colours of their cloaks or clothing. Drab, muted colours are the norm, all the better to blend in with the wilderness through which they hunt.

Gondor

Boromir of Gondor comes alone and unbidden to the Council of Elrond, having travelled the long and perilous journey from Minas Tirith to seek wisdom from the Master of Rivendell.

The consummate soldier and commander of Gondor's armies, Boromir greets the news that The One Ring is found as a chance to rise victorious in the fight against Sauron. He envisages using Isildur's Bane as a weapon against the Dark Lord. His suggestions are, while not ridiculed, set sternly aside and it is eventually through his strength of arms that he provides the greatest assistance to the council.

Volunteering himself as one of the representatives of the Free Peoples, in the quest to Mount Doom, Boromir vows that Gondor will see The Ring destroyed, for if there is one Man mighty enough to accomplish that task, surely it is Boromir of Gondor.
The Elves of Mirkwood

Not all the Elves at the Council of Elrond come from Rivendell, or even from the smaller havens scattered throughout Eriador. Some hail from Rhovanion, from the halls of Thranduil that are hidden beneath the boughs of Mirkwood.

The Wood Elves know firsthand the evil that Sauron wreaks. Clad in the form and name of the Necromancer, it was Sauron that corrupted Greenwood the Great and transformed it into the dank and gloomy horror that is Mirkwood. Whilst Elrond and his fellows fight against Sauron because of long-ago deeds, the Elves of Mirkwood are locked in a daily battle for survival both against the Dark Lord’s minions and his insidious influence. Should the Wood Elves falter, even for a moment, Thranduil’s kingdom would fall, and shortly thereafter so would much of Rhovanion.

The Elves of Mirkwood are well known for their stubbornness and hostility to outsiders. Even so, they know well that the battle against Sauron can only be won if the Free Peoples combine. To this end they have grudgingly aided their allies on many occasions, and even assisted Gandalf in the capture of Gollum. It was Gollum’s eventual escape that brought a party of Mirkwood Elves to the Council of Elrond, where Thranduil’s son, Legolas, relayed the unfortunate news. So it was that Gollum caused Legolas to be in the correct place, at the correct time to join The Fellowship of The Ring. Who can say how the War of The Ring would have unfolded had the peerless Mirkwood archer been elsewhere?

Legolas (Elf) ........................................90 points

Legolas is the son of the King of the Wood Elves and, like all his people, he is a deadly accurate and keen-sighted archer. Of the Free Peoples, he represents the Elves as part of The Fellowship.

Alternatively, he can decide to fire just one arrow, but in this case he will hit automatically, regardless of objects ‘in the way’ or if the target is in combat.

Tradition often dictates the colours worn by Mirkwood Elves. Whilst all members of a Mirkwood fighting company will typically be clad in the same colours, details will vary between individuals.

The Dwarves of Durin's Line

The final race represented in any number at the Council of Elrond are the Dwarves. The shared history of the Elves and Dwarves is a long and convoluted one – they have variously been staunch allies and bitter foes. While the two races can invariably be relied upon to stand united against Sauron, they share a deep and abiding mistrust that never seems to fade.

Nevertheless, Dwarves can always be relied upon to provide pragmatic counsel. In some realms Sauron’s threat is a looming shadow on the horizon that grows ever nearer, but that same shadow is already upon the Dwarves. Their holds remain secure for only as long as they are defended against loathsome Orcs and vicious Goblins. The Dwarves know that Sauron must be defeated, and soon, if Middle-earth is to be preserved.

Of all the Dwarves present at the Council of Elrond, it is Gimli who would play the greatest role in the War of The Ring. He had come to Rivendell as a messenger of dire tidings, carrying news that Sauron was actively seeking alliances with the Dwarves of Erebor and the Iron Hills. So it was that the Dark Lord unwittingly contributed to his own destruction. Without Sauron’s schemes, it is unlikely that Gimli would ever have been a member of The Fellowship or come to the defence of Gondor and Rohan. Few beings fought the hordes of Mordor with as much gusto as Gimli, son of Glóin.

Gimli, Son of Glóin (Dwarf) .................90 points

Like all Dwarf-kind, Gimli, son of Glóin, is grim and plain-speaking but also a doughty warrior. His courage and his axe are equally valuable additions to The Fellowship on their journey. Gimli is heavily armoured in the fashion of Dwarf warriors and is well accustomed to the rigours of combat. Gimli proves a stalwart warrior during the bitter fighting of the war against Sauron, slaying a multitude of Orcs with his fearsome axe.

At an additional points cost, Gimli can be given the following:

Special Rules
Axes of the Dwarves! At the beginning of each fight, Gimli can choose to either use an axe in each hand, in which case he fights with 3 Attacks, or use his unique two-handed axe, in which case he adds +1 to his dice rolls to Wound, but he does not suffer the usual -1 penalty on the roll to win the fight.

If all the grievances that stand between Elves and Dwarves are to be brought up here, we may as well abandon this Council!“

Gandalf, The Fellowship of The Ring

Dáin
Dáin is a doughty fighter and an able leader for any Dwarf army. All Dwarves are tough, but Dáin is nigh-unkillable, with Defence 9 and 3 Wounds. This, combined with his deadly axe Barazantathúl, ensures that Dáin can always get stuck in where the fighting is thickest.

Clan of Erebor

Dwarves have a runic alphabet that they use to name their weapons and armour. Some runes are secret things, hidden from the vision of all but skilled craftsmen. Others are bold declarations of swift death to come at the hands of a vengeful Dwarf!
Scenario 1: The Three Hunters

The Fellowship is broken. Sam and Frodo are gone. Boromir lies slain. Merry and Pippin are taken. Though his plans lie in ruins, Aragorn refuses to yield to the caprices of fortune. He resolves to rescue Merry and Pippin from Saruman’s grim band of Uruk-hai, and both Legolas and Gimli waste no time in pledging themselves to this fresh cause. So it is that a Man, an Elf and a Dwarf begin the long pursuit across the wild land of Rohan. These three hunters cannot know that the Hobbits they seek will in fact be rescued through the actions of Eomer and Treebeard, they know only that the chase shall not be abandoned, even should all the Orcs in southern Rhovanion stand in their way!

To win this game, the Evil player has a continual supply of minions that he must use to wear down (and thusly slay) the three hunters.

- Gimli, son of Glóin

EVIL
- A selection of Evil models – the total points cost doesn’t really matter, provided none of the individual models costs more than about 50 points – most models should be in the 5 to 20 points value range. Players are free to select suitable models from their own collection, but should ideally aim to use creatures that one would expect to find in Rohan – Orcs, Uruk-hai, Wargs, Dunlendings and so on...

Layout
This scenario is played on a board 48"/122cm by 72"/188cm. The board should be littered with hills, boulders and areas of rocky difficult terrain.

Starting Positions
The Good Heroes are placed in base contact with the southern board edge. No Evil models are deployed at the start of the game – they will arrive as the game goes on.

Objectives
To win, the Evil player must kill two Good Heroes before they exit the board via the north edge. If all the Good Heroes escape, the Good player wins. If two Heroes escape, the game is a draw.

Special Rules
The Wilds of Rohan: There are many evil creatures that stalk the hills and fields of Rohan. Directed by Saruman’s influence, they now move to intercept the three hunters and slay them if they can. At the start of each Evil Move phase, the Evil player rolls a D6 – this is the number of reinforcements he receives, chosen from any models currently not in play. The Evil player then rolls a further D6 for each of these reinforcements to determine which board edge it arrives on. On a 1, the model arrives from the north board edge, on a 2-3 it arrives on the west board edge, on a 4-5 it arrives on the east board edge, and on a 6 it arrives on the south board edge. The Evil player places the model in base contact with the relevant board edge – the model may then move normally, although it may not charge in the turn it arrives. Naturally, the Evil force cannot be broken in this scenario.
Scenario 2:

In Defence of Rivendell

What if Rivendell had come under attack by Sauron's minions as the Council of Elrond was taking place? Would the combined might of the Heroes within those hallowed walls have been able to turn aside the Dark Lord's evil creatures long enough for Frodo to carry The Ring to safety? Now you can find out. In this scenario, the Witch-king emerged unscathed from the confrontation at Bruinen Ford and has awoken the Evil beasts of the north to malice. Will The One Ring elude the Witch-king's grasp?

To win this game, the Good player must escort Frodo to safety, using the combined talents of some of the Free People's greatest Heroes.

Participants

GOOD
- Frodo Baggins (carrying The Ring).
- Up to 1500 points of warriors and Heroes, representing the Council of Elrond and/or Rivendell's garrison of Elves and Rangers of the North.

EVIL
- The Witch-king of Angmar
- Up to 1500 points of warriors and Heroes, representing the assembled legions of the Witch-king. These models should ideally be chosen from the Moria, Angmar, or one of the Mordor army lists, but players should feel free to use other models from their collections if they wish.

Layout
This scenario is played on a board 48/112cm by 48/112cm. The board should be littered with hills, boulders and areas of rocky difficult terrain. If you have an Elven building to represent Rivendell, this should be placed in the centre of the board. Don't worry if you have no such building, the battle can just as easily be assumed to start away from the main houses of the haven.

Starting Positions
Frodo is placed in the centre of the board, with all other Good models placed within 18/42cm of him. The Evil models are divided into four roughly equal groups, with each group placed up to 6/14cm in from each board edge.

Objectives
To win, the Evil player must kill Frodo Baggins in close combat. If he does so, an Evil minion is assumed to claim The Ring for his master – the battle, and the free world, is lost to Sauron. The Good player wins if Frodo escapes the board by any edge. Any other result is a draw.

Special Rules
The Eye of the Witch-king: So soon after Weatherotten, Frodo will not risk wearing The Ring whilst the Witch-king lives. Once the Witch-king is slain, Frodo may put on The Ring if the Good player wishes.

Unending Horde: The Witch-king’s forces are far larger than can be contained on this fraction of the battlefield. At the start of each Evil Move phase, the Evil player rolls 2D6 – this is the number of reinforcements he receives, chosen from any warriors slain previously in the game. The Evil player then rolls a further D6 for each of these reinforcements to determine which board edge it arrives on. On a 1, the model arrives from the north board edge, on a 2-3 it arrives on the west board edge, on a 4-5 it arrives on the east board edge, and on a 6 it arrives on the south board edge. The Evil player places the model in base contact with the relevant board edge – the model may then move normally, although it may not charge in the same turn that it arrives.

War to End All Wars: Neither of the forces can be broken in this scenario.
In the first of a two-part article, Gav Thorpe discusses raiding in the Warhammer world, presenting rules that will allow players to burn, plunder and enslave their way to glory.

War and devastation engulf the Warhammer world. From the far north, the deadly armies of Chaos spill forth, intent on destruction and death. In the Worlds Edge Mountains and the Badlands, greenskin tribes gather to smash and plunder the settlements of more civilised races. Vampires lead forth armies of the dead to sweep aside the transient domains of the living. Swathed in storms, the Black Arks of the Dark Elves prowl the coasts of the world seeking fresh prey. In dark forest groves Beastmen gather about their herdstones before bursting forth upon the lands of men in a tide of drunken, bestial looting and destruction.

Who could resist the chance to recreate these bloody and devastating raids on the tabletop? Well, certainly not I! Whilst writing the Dark Elves army book, it struck me that looting, slaving and arson were as much a part of the grand history of Warhammer as the heroic, glorious pitched battles that decide the fate of nations. It kindled in me the desire to wreak havoc upon the towns and villages of my opponents. I wanted the experience of kicking down doors and stealing gold, the cold-hearted joy of snatching up screaming prisoners to drag back to the slave mines of Naggaroth and the righteous pleasure of putting stinking greenskin hovels to the torch!

Thus inspired, I set to creating some fun scenarios that would allow Warhammer players to indulge these desires and soon found that there were more ideas than would comfortably fit into a single game. This spawned the six scenarios presented over the course of this two-part article. Once I had started writing these battles, it then became obvious that the ultimate expression of the “pillage urge” that had struck me previously would be to fight a series of linked battles that would allow me to chart the successes of my bloodthirsty raiders as they roamed and burned at will across the lands of my foe. I hope my ideas kindle in you some of the excitement that can be had battling to defend a besieged farmstead or seizing the riches of an exotic temple.
Common Raids Rules

To save space in the individual scenarios, here are some rules that cover the various situations that can occur in Raids games. As well as being used in the scenarios I’ve written, they also provide a great example of “house rules” that you might want to create or to add to other types of games. For example, you might decide that buildings in your “pitched battle” game can be looted and that each loot counter is worth 100 victory points (in the same way as a captured banner). This small change can have quite an effect on a Warhammer battle.

Some of the rules are used in the scenarios in this month’s White Dwarf, whilst others don’t make an appearance until next month – don’t let this stop you using them in scenarios of your own devising in the meantime though!

Setting Fires

Enemy troops holed up in a building can be difficult to shift, so sometimes the best way to get them out is to set fire to the building they’re defending. On the other hand, some creatures are just nasty by nature and like to indulge in a bit of arson just because they feel like it.

A unit must be equipped with torches in order to set a building on fire – such units are outlined in the scenario. The unit must be in contact with the building at the end of the Close Combat phase. A unit attempting to set a building on fire must charge the building as if it was an enemy unit and does not fight in close combat, even if the building is occupied. At the end of the Close Combat phase, roll a D6 for each unit attempting to set a building on fire. On a roll of a 4, 5 or 6, the building catches alight – place a suitable marker on or near the building.

Alternatively, a unit that can make ranged flaming attacks (such as a Sun Dragon’s fiery breath, a Dwarf Cannon with a Rune of Burning or a Dark Elf Sorceress with Lore of Fire spells) can use the attack to target a building. No damage is done to any units by the attack, but each building hit by the attack will be set on fire on a D6 roll of a 4, 5 or 6.

Roll 2D6 at the start of every subsequent player turn for each building on fire. If the result is a double, the building collapses. A collapsed building should be replaced with a suitable area of ruins and rubble that counts as impassable terrain and imposes a -1 to hit penalty on any shooting that passes over the smoking ruins. If the building is occupied when it collapses, the unit inside takes 2D6 Strength 5 hits with no armour saves allowed. The unit is then placed outside the ruins by the owning player, anywhere still in contact with the building’s remnants. If there is nowhere to place the unit (if the building was surrounded, for example) the occupying unit is destroyed – burnt alive or cut down as they flee.

A unit occupying a building that is on fire takes damage at the start of each of the unit’s turns. The unit suffers 2D6 Strength 5 hits, with no armour saves allowed. Note that this will cause a Panic test if the unit suffers 25% or more casualties.

Taking Prisoners

Some races deliberately set out to take captives for many notarious reasons – the Dark Elves, Orcs & Goblins, and Skaven chief amongst them. Others may take captives to interrogate for information, or as hostages to exchange for various demands or wealth at a later date.

In a game that allows the taking of prisoners, if a unit pursues (or charges) and catches a fleeing enemy, they will take prisoners as well as capturing standards. Place a prisoner marker beside the capturing unit each time it runs down an enemy unit. In addition, if the enemy unit contained any characters, roll a D6 for each character in the unit. On a roll of a 4, 5 or 6, the character is amongst the captives and the pursuing unit gains an additional prisoner token for each captured character. If a unit with prisoners is forced to flee for any reason or is wiped out then any prisoners escape or are abandoned and the prisoner tokens are lost.

If a Giant picks up and captures an enemy model (by stuffing him down his trousers, for example!) this gains the Giant a prisoner token. If the Giant is subsequently slain, the prisoners are lost.

Looting

Many attacks on villages and towns are for the simple purpose of looting and pillaging. The attackers may be after gold, gems and other valuables, but they could also be in search of food, grumril, warpsone or other such commodities. Some buildings such as temples, palaces and warehouses can contain a treasure trove of riches for a determined raider.

A unit occupying a building and not in close combat can search it for valuables at the end of each of its Movement phases. Roll a D6. On a roll of a 1 there is nothing to be found and nowhere else to look - the building contains no loot at all and cannot be searched again for the remainder of the battle. On a roll of a 2 or 3 the unit finds nothing of worth but can continue to search in future turns. On a roll of 4, 5 or 6 the unit finds something worth keeping and gains a loot marker.

A unit can carry a maximum of one loot marker for every full five points of unit strength it has. For example, a unit of eighteen Unit Strength 1 models can carry up to three loot tokens. If a unit starts a turn with more loot markers than it can carry, it must immediately drop one anywhere in contact with the unit. A unit that flees for any reason or is wiped out also drops all of its loot. Abandoned loot markers can be picked up by other units simply by moving into contact or over the marker (including units pursuing an enemy broken in combat).

Units with one or more loot markers may voluntarily move off the tabletop and do not count as destroyed - any loot they are carrying is safe. Units that pursue or charge off the table have the option of staying off the table or returning as normal (with any carried loot). Units may also voluntarily drop loot counters at the start of their Movement phase, so that other (possibly faster) units may pick them up and carry the loot to safety.

Watchtowers

Some buildings are purpose-built to resist attack and provide a bastion from which troops can pour missile fire into an attacking enemy force or sally forth on a counter-attack. These are a special feature called watchtowers.

A watchtower is treated as a normal building with the following exceptions. A unit may charge from a watchtower - the charge distance is measured from the watchtower’s closest wall but is otherwise resolved as normal. Twice as many models may shoot from a watchtower as would normally be allowed. If a unit occupies a watchtower it may re-roll missed attacks in close combat, as attacking foes are easy targets as they attempt to break in.

A watchtower may have a flat roof that can hold a war machine. If the model allows it, a war machine may be deployed onto the roof of a watchtower, but it cannot then be moved for the rest of the game. The watchtower may be occupied by another unit as normal, but the watchtower loses the benefit of additional models shooting as the war machine occupies the additional space they would normally fire from. The war machine crew do not fight in close combat if the watchtower is assaulted, unless there is no other unit in the watchtower. If this is the case, the crew will act as the defending unit as per the normal rules. As it counts as a normal building, a watchtower can be set on fire if the scenario rules allow it.
Scenario 1 - Deathly Silence

Raiders rely upon their prey being unaware of the approaching danger and so will go to great lengths to ensure that their presence remains undetected. This scenario sees the attackers attempting to overrun a beacon tower before the occupants can raise the alarm.

The Battlefield
A single watchtower is placed in the centre of the battlefield. Other terrain is placed by mutual agreement, but not within 18" of the watchtower.

Forces
This battle takes place between two equally sized forces chosen to a pre-agreed points limit. The defenders must have at least one infantry unit to act as the watchtower garrison.

Deployment
One unit must be deployed inside the watchtower as its garrison. The defender may also place a war machine on the roof if this is possible. The defender's remaining units may be deployed anywhere within 12" of the watchtower.

The attacking army is then deployed anywhere on the table at least 18" away from a defending unit.

Fighting the Battle
The attackers have the first turn. The battle lasts for eight turns.

Special Rules
Watchtower.

Victory Conditions
If any defending unit, except for a war machine, still occupies the watchtower after eight turns, the defender wins. If ever an attacking unit occupies the watchtower, the attacker wins immediately. If the watchtower is unoccupied at the end of eight turns, the attacker wins.

Attackers and Defenders
All of these Raid scenarios have an attacking army and a defending army. It is perfectly possible to play any of these games with an army not necessarily specifically picked for a Raid scenario. In this case, simply agree with your opponent who is going to attack and who is going to defend (or you might like to roll a dice, toss a coin, have an egg-and-spoon race, or whatever). Alternatively, both players might agree in advance who will be the attacking player and who will be the defending player, and then pick their armies accordingly. As long as both players have had equal opportunity to prepare for the game (or not, as the case may be) you shouldn't encounter any real problems playing.
Scenario 2 - Loot and Pillage

In the Imperial Year 2173 the Black Ark Tower of Infinite Pleasures attacked the town of Handelsee on the coast of the Sea of Claws. Led by Durath Blackspur, the Dark Elves surrounded the town under the cover of night and then moved in for the kill. When the Count of Nordland's forces investigated the smoking ruins five days later they found no sign – either alive or dead – of the 8000 townsfolk who had lived there.

Gold, gems, weapons and food can all be the target of an attacking force. Some simply seek riches, others need to loot supplies in order to feed their warriors, pay their troops and attendants, or otherwise keep their army together in some way.

The Battlefield
Three buildings are placed within 12" of the centre of the table and no closer than 4" to each other. Other terrain is placed in any mutually agreed fashion with no piece within 12" of the buildings.

Forces
This battle takes place between two equally-sized forces chosen to a pre-agreed points limit. There are no specific restrictions on army selection.

Deployment
The defending army is deployed anywhere within 12" of the centre of the table, and units may be deployed inside buildings. The attacking army is then deployed anywhere on the table at least 18" from a defending unit.

Fighting the Battle
The attackers have the first turn. The battle lasts for ten turns.

Special Rules
Looting.

Victory Conditions
The attacker scores one point for each loot counter in their possession at the end of the game. The defender scores one point for each attacking unit destroyed, fleeing at the end of the battle or having fled from the table. The player with the most points wins the scenario.
Dread Raiders

You can use any army you like in Raid scenarios, but those that contain fast moving units and skirmishers work particularly well. Dark Elves, Skaven, Beasts of Chaos and Orcs & Goblins all perform very well in raiding situations – Wolf Riders, Beast Herds and the like are all very characterful units when playing Raids scenarios. Here is a Dark Elf army optimised for Raids scenarios, with its Dark Riders, Corsairs and Assassins.

The army is led by the dread-pirate, Lokhir Fellheart, and represents a contingent from his Black Ark, the Tower of Blessed Dread. The core of the raiding force is made up of two large units of Black Ark Corsairs, that, along with the Reaper Bolt Throwers, represent the Black Ark’s contingent of Marines.

A unit of nobles, the Cold One Knights, accompany the expedition, and the rest of the army, Dark Riders and Shades, act as advanced scouts despatched ahead of the force making land.

A TALE OF FOUR GAMERS

It's month two of our hobby challenge and our intrepid gamers take to the field of battle for the first time. What new models have they added to their armies? How will they fare in battle? And will Pete have painted his models on time this month?

Last month we kicked off the new series of A Tale of Four Gamers, which follows the lives and loves of four hobbyists as they embark on the path of collecting a new army. Each month we set each of our gamers a new hobby challenge, be it painting a new squad or playing their first game. Then we check back with them at the end of the month to see how they've got on.

In Month 1, our gamers received their first miniatures and began painting their new armies. But, of course, painting and assembling miniatures is only one part of the hobby, so we decided it was high time they played a game or two as well.

This month, we set our four gamers the task of getting their armies to a battle-ready state, and then to play their first games.

Month 2 Rules

Each month, we’ll assign each of our four gamers a task to build on their army in some way, culminating in each player having an army of at least 1500pts. Then, at the end of the month, we’ll judge how well they’ve done and award them points. At the end of the series, the player with the most points will win a fabulous prize. Or some beer. For Month 2 we thought the players should start gaming with their new armies, so points are on offer for playing games – if they play several games before the deadline, they can pick their best result.

RITES OF BATTLE

Last month we set Space Marine Veteran Neil Hodgson the task of building a new Codex Chapter of Adeptus Astartes. Armed with pots of blue and red paint and the Citadel Spray Gun, Neil has started a Crimson Fists army. This month we catch up with him post-Black Reach.

Neil: Much as last month, when I painted an entire Space Marine Battleforce, it was pretty straightforward this month to decide what I was going to paint and add to my force – the contents of Assault on Black Reach! The Black Reach models were really nice to paint, not to mention quick to put together. Better still, you can't tell the difference between the new push-fit miniatures and the multi-part plastics I painted last month.

As promised last month, the first thing I painted was the new Space Marine Captain from Black Reach. Basically, I painted him in the same way as the rest of my Crimson Fists, except I took a bit more time with the highlights, picking out a few of the details in white. The end result makes him stand out on the battlefield, whilst ensuring he fits in with the rest of the army.

I also painted the plastic Dreadnought. Because a Dreadnought straddles the line between a tank and a miniature, it's always a tricky prospect knowing how to paint it. I used a combination of drybrushing – as I do with my tanks – and regular highlights and blending.

This month also saw my Crimson Fists take to the battlefield for the first time. I found a willing opponent in the form of expert army painter, Chris Peach, and his traitorous Imperial Guard army. As I was midway through painting my Black Reach Space Marines at the time, we settled on a 750pt game – just enough to get a flavour for the army so far, without requiring me to
CAPTAIN FERNANDEZ OF THE THIRD COMPANY

Despite his close-call in the battle, having stood too close to an exploding Dreadnought, Captain Fernandez fought admirably, leading the Crimson Fists to victory over the treacherous Imperial Guard. Neil painted the Captain using the same techniques as the rest of his army, to make him fit in with his Brother-Marines, but by adding white to the colour palette, Neil has given the model a distinctive appearance, helping him to stand out from the rank-and-file.

Unlike the regular Tactical Marines, Neil has painted his Captain with two red fists instead of one. Amongst the Crimson Fists, this denotes him as a veteran.

We rolled up an Annihilation mission – kill as much of the enemy force as possible – which was the first time I’d tried that particular mission out. When my more elite units, the Dreadnought and the Assault Marines, were wiped out on the first turn, I thought it was all over, but the Tactical Marines proved more than up to the task. The Assault Squad was charged by a unit of Rough Riders and brutally cut down, and the Dreadnought was blown up by a lucky shot, wounding the nearby Captain in the process! All the same, the Captain and the squads of Tactical Marines did really well – those 3+ power armour saves proved invaluable, especially against the Imperial Guard’s lasguns – and, after a somewhat ropey start, I managed to claim my first victory for the Crimson Fists.

Next month sees the release of the new Codex: Space Marines, and I can hardly wait. I’ve had a sneak peak at it and it’s all very exciting – I’m planning on adding Pedro Kantor and a unit of the new Sternguard Veterans to my force, which should reinforce the Crimson Fists’ background and character in my army. Up until now they’ve only been Crimson Fists superficially – next month they become Crimson Fists through and through.

Neil added the new plastic Dreadnought from Assault on Black Reach to his army this month. Unfortunately for Neil, Chris Peach blew the Dreadnought up in the first turn of the first game it was used. Hopefully not a sign of things to come.
LATE AGAIN

We set resident tournament expert, Pete Foley, the challenge of building a competitive army ready to take on all challengers. Pete’s 1500pt Eldar army is now well underway, although not fast enough for White Dwarf’s liking... Paint faster, Foley!

Pete: For the second instalment of my voyage through A Tale of Four Gamers, I finally managed to field painted miniatures on the tabletop. Last month I had ensured that I had a legal painted army by taking care of my two Troops choices and an Autarch for the HQ slot. This month I decided to bring out the big guns and painted a Falcon Grav Tank.

It really is great when you have painted all your compulsory choices and you have the rest of the Codex to choose your army from. It is a very liberating experience. However, having been on the wrong end of a beating at the hands of several different Eldar armies, the common theme of Falcons aplenty drew me straight in.

With the pulse laser to take care of tanks and a scatter laser for dealing with infantry, the Falcon has a tool for every job. It also has the added advantage of being virtually indestructible (or that is how it’s felt for me in the past, playing against them with my Blood Angels).

The new Warhammer 40,000 rules have meant that these awesome tanks are now a little less overbearing as, if you can pin them down in combat, they are unable to rely on their very reasonable front armour. Their shooting proficiency has also decreased slightly, because defensive weapons have been reclassified to Strength 4 instead of 6.

My first game was against my mate Andy and his Space Marine army. It packed a fair punch for 750pts, and he had managed to squeeze a Land Raider into it too! Although I lost, it was a close call and it taught me a great deal about how to use the Eldar army I was constructing. In fact it taught me a lesson which directly affects my army selection for this month.

I knew that Eldar were a fragile army – each unit needs to work in harmony with the others or the whole army will quickly fall apart. I didn’t believe it at first, but playing with Eldar over the last month has really changed my mind. Talking to Phil Kelly (it really is handy to have the author of the Codex within shouting distance), he gave me a solid piece of advice, which I hope he won’t mind me sharing. It is advice concerning the value of the Farseer in piecing together the various strands of your army. In every game there comes a turn where you really need to blow up that tank or you really need that assault to go your way, and with a Farseer you can turn what was a risky manoeuvre into a much more favourable stratagem. Ignoring the more destructive psychic powers like Mind War and Eldritch Storm, I have selected Guide and Doom. Both of these are powers that can really augment your army’s abilities in one part of the battlefield. Deploying him with the Dire Avengers in the Wave Serpent keeps him fairly safe as well as making sure he’s manoeuvrable enough so he can lend his weight to the part of the battlefield that needs him most.

My second game was against a completely different type of army and I have already seen the difference in the army’s capabilities. I played against the Dark Eldar army of another friend, Chris. The Eldar’s cursed cousins have many tricks up their sleeve and battling against them can be a tough proposition (I should know, as I have a Dark Eldar Wych Cult army of my own). My Farseer was able to aid the rest of my force to victory, Guiding the Falcon whilst Dooming several Dark Eldar units which, with my rather poor dice rolling, would otherwise have survived unscathed. I think I can safely say that the combination of a Farseer and an Autarch is here to stay!

Next month I am going to have to bite the bullet and start painting the rest of my Guardian Jetbikes. Three more units need to be painted and that should round out the army to about 1000pts. That’s a lot of iconography to paint, so I’m going to need a steady hand over the next month.

Pete has changed his army list since Month 1 after playing his first few games. Out go the Vipers, to be replaced by a Farseer. Pete had to drop something from his list to make room for his new HQ, and didn’t want to lose any troop choices or heavy hitters such as the Falcons.

THE BLOOD REAVER

Matt Hutson is busy collecting a Red Corsairs army, diligently making sure it fits the background of this traitorous Chapter. Last month we left him with a rapidly expanding force, bolstered by renegade Space Wolves. This month they are joined on the battlefield by the Tyrant of Badab himself.

Matt: Whilst Neil and Fil were struggling under the sheer weight of models from Black Reach, I had a little more free reign with what to add to my army this month. I wanted to play my first proper game (the drubbing I handed out to Fil last month doesn’t count) so I had to make the army legal – this meant painting up an HQ choice, and so I chose none other than Huron Blackheart, the Tyrant of Badab himself.

There was no doubt in my mind that I wanted to include Huron Blackheart in my army. He stands at the heart of the Red Corsairs’ background, and it would be remiss of me not to include him. It helps that the model is beautiful too, one of Juan Diaz’s finest – in fact it’s one of the main reasons to collect a Red Corsairs force!

I really wanted to go to town on Huron so I dug out the ‘Eavy Metal Masterclass from White Dwarf 333. I quite often turn to the ‘Eavy Metal team when I’ve got a particularly nice model to paint, and the stage-by-stage advice in the Masterclass article is full of invaluable tips. You don’t have to paint to an ‘Eavy Metal standard to get something out of a Masterclass – a novice painter can get just as many useful tips and techniques from the article as a more experienced painter can. I’m fairly confident with my own painting skills, but I still learned something new – when painting black, paint it grey and then give it a black wash so it has a ready-made highlight from the start.
I also painted up two extra Chaos Terminators. If you remember back to last month, I talked about painting the bare minimum of Terminators - three - to make the squad legal. Well this month I wanted to give the squad a bit more "oomph," taking it up to five strong. In my upcoming game I planned to take two of these as Terminator Champions, representing some of the original hardened veterans of the Astral Claws Chapter who turned against the Imperium. With the addition of a combi-flamer, my army was really taking on a fiery theme - so far I've got two heavy flamer, two combi-flamers and a flam, so it should do great against horde armies.

For my first proper game I decided to pick on Studio Sub-editor, Andrew Kenrick and his Salamanders army. Army selection was easy - we played a 750pt game so I basically took everything I had! But this doesn't mean that I had a random selection of miniatures in my army - I've carefully planned things out and have been collecting my army to an army list. In short, I hammered the Salamanders, but due to getting carried away killing the loyalist Space Marines, I'd forgotten to claim any objectives before the game ended on Turn 5, meaning the game was a draw! My ten-man squad had actually spent the entire game four inches away from one of the objectives but had got too preoccupied shooting their lascannon at the enemy to move onto it. Perhaps I was getting into the background of the Red Corsairs a bit too much!

Despite this slight mishap, the army performed very well indeed. Taking an aggressive approach to the game really paid off, putting Andrew on the back foot from Turn 1. Huron tore apart the Salamander Captain, thanks to the combination of his power fist and the Warptime psychic power, and the Terminators' array of flamers weapons ravaged a Tactical Squad. That said, my ability to snatch objectives was somewhat limited as I only had two Troop choices, with hindsight I should have split them into at least three squads of five.

Next month I think I need to add more Troops to my army, as well as something a bit nasty for the Shooting phase. I'm thinking of adding at least another squad of five Chaos Space Marines to give me three Troop choices, as well as a fearsome Vindicator to give me a much-needed boost to my hitting power.

'ERE WE GO AGAIN

Last month we gave Fil a whole Battleforce to paint, and this month he's got the contents of Black Reach — that's a lot of Orks by anyone's standards. Luckily, Fil has experience (and a helpful painting assistant in the form of his wife...) on his side.

Fil: Normally, especially in my day job, I hate batch painting. I prefer to paint miniatures one at a time, but with the sheer number of models staring at me from Black Reach I had to ditch that plan! I assembled and painted ten models at a time — it's hard work, but it's the most efficient way of getting them done and on the table. Well, it's either that or ask my wife to help!

I painted all of the Orks from Black Reach this month and, actually, it wasn't the hard slog I thought it would be. The models are spot on and fit in with the rest of my Orks perfectly. I mixed the Black Reach Orks in with the Orks from the Battleforce, using the multi-part plastic kits to make some extra Nobz to lead them. This gives me two 20-Ork squads, each with a Nob, and once they're painted and on the table you can't tell the difference.

The Deffkoptas were nice and simple to paint, mainly because they're made of rusted scrap-metal! I used the same technique on them as I did when painting Ork armour — lots of battle damage. They're assembled straight out of the box, with my customary addition of a glyph plate or two.

The new Ork Warboss is fantastic. Because I'm painting my Orks as members of the Goff Clan, I'll be looking to have Ghazghkull at the head of my army at some point, but until then I'm more than happy to have the Black Reach Warboss as my HQ. I started by taking a bit more time painting him, lavishing more attention on him and so on, but I ended up spraying him black and starting again! I wanted the Warboss to blend in with the rest of the army so I painted him the same way as the rest of my Orks. If it's good enough for a Boy, it's good enough for the Boss.

I got to play my first proper game (last month's mini-game against Matt doesn't count!), playing a 750pt game against Glenn's Eldar army. It was a really friendly game and he managed to force me to a draw, so I've still not won with the

'EAD OF THE WAAAGH!

The Ork Warboss from the Assault on Black Reach boxed game is a dynamic, three-part miniature ideal to lead an Ork Waaagh! Fil decided to use the model as the HQ choice for his army.

Fil painted his Ork Warboss in the same way as the rest of his greenskin horde, to ensure that he fits in with the rest of the army. He did lavish additional attention on the details of the model, like the blood-splatters on the power klaw.
greenskins. They play really differently to the way my regular armies do, and it's taking some getting used to. I'm used to highly specialised armies – Deathwing, Chaos Space Marines or mechanised Tau – where everything has a specific role. Orks aren't quite so specialised, although they're very good at what they do – smashing things up in an assault!

I got a bit carried away by this though and charged forwards with everything, completely abandoning my home objective! This was clearly a bad idea against those slippery Eldar, and Glenn's jetbikes swooped round and snatched it from right under my nose! My Warboss and the Nobz Mob did fantastically, despite their Trukk being blown up on Turn 1 by a sneaky Wave Serpent. They smashed everything they could get their green hands on, nabbing me an objective from the Eldar, although they had to walk across the board and get shot by everything along the way. I think some more Trukks are in order for the future, to get my Boyz into contact with the enemy earlier on.

The Defikoptas were the stars of the show though. A lucky rokkit from one of them destroyed the Wave Serpent in my first Shooting phase – revenge for my Trukk! They also hacked up the Dire Avengers in assault, before doubling back towards my own lines to chase off those pesky Guardian Jetbikes. The game ended on Turn 5 – one more turn and I might have been able to contest the second objective and claim victory!

Next month I'm going to add another Trukk and I'd also like something to pull fire away from the rest of the army – I'm thinking either a Dredd or some Killa Kanz, or maybe both!

OPOSSING VIEW

White Dwarf's Glenn More says:

It was an interesting game, and not only because Fil was so new to his army. The game was small, which made it very tactical, every unit having a specific role with no redundancies. It's always daunting fighting Orks – facing 45 models in a 750pt game is intimidating to say the least. And I was caught out by his Warboss making his Nobz Mob a Troops choice, and thus able to take objectives!

NEXT MONTH

Next month our four gamers' armies reach 1000pts and we have a special task in store, worth some precious bonus points.

THE BATTLE FOR BLACK REACH

Resident alien enthusiast and author of Codex: Orks, Phil Kelly, presents a three-stage campaign based around the contents of the Assault on Black Reach boxed game. These missions can be played independently or as a linked campaign, so read on, grab your box set and get playing!

BLACK REACH

Black Reach is but the latest battlefield in a timeless epic of violence and bloody conflict fought between the Adeptus Astartes and the hordes of greenskinned aliens that seek to conquer the galaxy. So numerous are the Ork invasions that plague the stars that, despite the swiftness of the Space Marine Strike Cruisers, the Adeptus Astartes often arrive too late to stop once-productive Imperial worlds being consumed by war.

Such was the case with the mining world of Black Reach and, to a lesser extent, its neighbouring planets Jedegh and Voldermacht. All three planets were overcome by a surging Ork Waaagh! which burst into realspace through Jorgund’s Eye, a wormhole thought to be connected to the Eldar webway in the Vidar sector. How the primitive Ork fleet pulled off such a feat of interstellar bravado is unknown, but the greenskin forces descended upon the Black Reach system so quickly that such questions were put aside in favour of readying for the coming battle.

The planet of Black Reach, though ostensibly valueless, is of great tactical importance to the empire of Ultramar.

The planet is surrounded by a series of asteroid belts so dense that, should Black Reach and its vast array of orbital debris ever become infested by aliens, it would take centuries to exterminate them all. Furthermore, the magnetic elements of the asteroid belt make it extremely difficult to contact Black Reach from out-system, let alone augur the whereabouts of individual armies and their war leaders. An alien invasion could be mustered there, right under the nose of Ultramar, and remain undetected until it was time to strike.

As a result, when the fleet’s long-range auspice arrays confirmed their Astropaths’ claims that the system of Black Reach was under attack, the warriors of Ultramar were left with no choice. Without any real knowledge of the size or disposition of the enemy forces, the Adeptus Astartes would have to engage the invaders upon Black Reach itself and, bereft of any real support, destroy every last one of them before the system became choked with greenskin spores. Due to the encroaching Hive Fleets penetrating the eastern sector of the Ultramar empire, only the Ultramarines 2nd Company could be spared to stem the Ork menace. Captain Sicarius, an inspiring leader and exceptional warrior whose star was in the ascendant, was tasked with taking a detachment of Ultramarines planet-side, ascertaining the disposition of the Ork forces and reinforcing the embattled Imperial Guard garrison native to Black Reach. The Captain also had a mission of his own — to bring back the head of the Ork war leader behind the invading horde.

Sicarius vowed that his men were equal to the task, provided they were afforded full planetstrike support from the Imperial Navy. The Captain’s plan was for the fleet to unleash a punishing orbital bombardment of meltas and plasma warheads prior to the Ultramarines’ main attack, whilst heading planet-side within his personal Thunderhawk Gunship, the Gladius. Sicarius would seek out the sections of the battlezones where the Ork forces still maintained a disciplined formation even in the terrifying midst of the bombardment, reasoning that this would be the location of the Ork Warboss. He would then land and personally execute the Warboss at the heart of this new invasion. It was a plan so audacious that even Sicarius’ serjeants had their doubts as to its feasibility, but the Ultramarines were ever famous for their courage and skill in the face of extreme danger. Battle-hymns were sung, weapons were primed, and before long the strike was launched.

“The Ultramarines were ever famous for their courage and skill in the face of extreme danger.”

52 WHITE DWARF BLACK REACH CAMPAIGN
THE CAMPAIGN

Any general worth his battle scars knows that winning a battle is not the same as winning a war and, for many, the wargaming campaign is the zenith of the hobby. If you’ve never played one before, this is an ideal place to start!

What’s a Campaign?
A campaign is a series of linked games, usually set in the same battlezone or upon a particular planet. There are many different types of campaign, ranging from a simple set of themed games to world-spanning map campaigns (watch out for the 40K answer to Mighty Empires in future issues...). The Assault on Black Reach campaign presented here is nice and simple – a series of three linked games set in the shattered outskirts of Ghospora Hive. As with all campaigns, winning a single game is not enough – whichever combatant does the best overall will be the ultimate victor. This is one of the reasons why campaigns are so much fun – it is possible to wrest victory from the jaws of defeat, and so the winner must press home his advantage every chance he gets.

Playing the Campaign
The Assault on Black Reach campaign cannot be played in one day – instead you will need to play it over a weekend, or even a period of a few weeks. Though the first and last missions only require two players to duke it out, the second mission requires a lot of models and hence is best played with a bunch of friends. Many campaigns like to save the biggest battle till last, but we wanted the Assault on Black Reach to focus on the bitter rivalry between Captain Sicarius and Warboss Zanzag, so the last game is a little more character-focused. This gives the two principal players of the campaign time to work up a good rivalry for the grudge match of the campaign’s finale.

Sicarius and Zanzag
Veteran gamers may have seen their favourite characters ‘die’ on the battlefield dozens of times, but somehow they always come back. We like to think this is because the battle leaders of each army are tough as nails and possessed of true grit – a lethal blow that would kill a lesser mortal might only knock our heroes out, or send them sprawling into the dust. You can rest assured they will return, ready to restore their honour and wreak their bloody revenge. In other words, if Zanzag or Sicarius “die” several times over the course of the campaign, don’t worry about it – a lifetime of pain and suffering is par for the course in the 41st Millennium!

Winning the Campaign
Every campaign needs some criteria by which a player can emerge triumphant. In the Assault on Black Reach campaign this is simple – every game will award one or both players a number of “Campaign Points”, depending on the objectives of the mission. Keep a record of the number each player accrues over the course of the campaign. The player with the most Campaign Points at the end of the campaign is the winner, simple as that.

WHY APOCALYPSE?
The second mission in this campaign uses the Apocalypse rules. This is because an important part of playing Warhammer 40,000 is that, provided your opponent agrees to it, anything goes! We want to encourage gamers to play weird and wonderful scenarios and to use all the models in their collection from the get-go. If you don’t have a large collection of models, you can get together with a few friends or the lads down the local gaming store, combine your forces and play a multi-player game – there should be no shortage of Ork and Space Marine players to help bolster your forces. Alternatively, if you prefer a more traditional Warhammer 40,000 game, you can skip the big game in the middle of the campaign and cut straight to the exciting climax. Be warned, though, you will be missing out on a real battle royale...
SCENARIO ONE

THE EYE OF THE STORM

This scenario uses just the contents of Assault on Black Reach.

Upon the embattled world of Black Reach, a punishing orbital bombardment from the Strike Cruiser, Valin’s Revenge, hammers into the ranks of the greenskin invaders. Seeking to confirm the ever-resourceful Warboss Zanzag’s death by killing him personally outside the walls of Ghospora Hive, Captain Sicarius leads a Thunderhawk assault upon the Ork leader. Sicarius’ tactical acumen quickly locates Warboss Zanzag and his retinue, and the Captain issues the order to land the Thunderhawk and attack. As all around is consumed by the wrath of the orbital bombardments, Sicarius and Zanzag meet blade to blade in the eye of the storm.

Objective: Decapitation

The players are attempting to slay the leader of the opposing force – Zanzag so he can mount Sicarius’ head as a trophy. Sicarius so he can save the system of Black Reach from an eternity of war against an infestation of Orks.

If the Ork player has killed Sicarius by the end of the game, he scores a victory and is awarded one Campaign Point. Conversely, if the Space Marine player has killed Zanzag by the end of the game, he scores a victory and is awarded one Campaign Point. Any other result is a draw – no Campaign Points are awarded.

Set-up

1. Set up a 4’ x 4’ table. The Ork player deploys first. He may deploy his units anywhere on the table provided all units have a model within 6” of the Warboss.
2. The Space Marine player then sets up anywhere on the table, though no model may be within 12” of an Ork model.
3. The Deffkoptas may then make their scout move.
4. Roll a D6. The player with the highest score may choose to go first or second.

Game Length

The game lasts six turns, by which time the bombardments have grown too intense and both sides are forced to withdraw to safety, carrying their fallen with them.

Special Rule: SICARIUS’ GAMBLE

Whilst the warring forces close, all hell breaks loose around them as the Imperial Navy continues their bombardment. At the end of each game turn, both players roll a dice. If one player rolls a 1, then all models within 6” of a board edge take a S7 hit with an AP of 3 as the inferno rages around them. If both players roll a 1, then a warhead detonates on their position! All models on the board take a S7 hit with an AP of 3.
SCENARIO TWO

ASSAULT ON ZANZAG’S LAIR

This battle is an Apocalypse mission with at least 3000 points per side. The forces must include a Space Marine Captain and an Ork Warboss. In addition to their agreed points, the Imperial side has a Thunderhawk Gunship, and the Orks have an Ork Submersible.

 Forced to withdraw, Zanzag escaped the battle at the walls of Ghospora Hive, and both factions recovered swiftly from their earlier encounter. Sicarius was unable to trace Zanzag’s retreat, so instead he tasked Scout Sergeant Telion with finding the Warboss’ hidden lair. Telion did this by waiting patiently for Zanzag’s Lootas to appear and, when they surfaced, placing a tracer beacon upon their ramshackle submersible before it returned to base. Armed with the coordinates of the Ork base, the Ultramarines readied their forces and prepared to mount a full-scale raid upon Zanzag’s position.

Winning the Game
The winner of the game is the player with the most objectives at the end of the game. If both players have the same number of objectives, count up victory points to see who is the winner of the game. That player is awarded a Campaign Point.

An extra Campaign Point is awarded if a player manages to take down his enemy’s war leader (Sicarius or Zanzag). Keep track of how many Campaign Points you have accrued – you’ll need them to see who has won the Black Reach campaign.

Objective: Annihilation
Not only must each force attempt to secure objectives, but they must also attempt to kill each others’ war leaders. If Sicarius is slain, leave his model in place, lying on its side. That model represents an objective that can only be claimed by the Ork side. Conversely, if Zanzag is slain, he is left lying on the table as an objective that only the Space Marine side can claim.

Special Rule:
THUNDERHAWK ASSAULT
The Imperial side begins the game with the Thunderhawk already in play, it may not be held in Strategic Reserve. It is treated as a skimmer for the duration of the game – though Zanzag’s lair is enormous, there isn’t enough room for a Thunderhawk Gunship to go flying about the place!
SPECIAL STRATEGIC ASSETS

In addition to the normal strategic assets available to the players, they receive the following new assets:

Ork Force

Supashootas

Zanzag is not only a determined and deadly Warboss, but also something of a dab hand with machinery, having begun life as an ambitious Mek. When he is not bashing in heads, Zanzag likes to build new and ever more devastating war machines and weapons to test upon his victims. Perhaps his finest creation is the supacharged shoota, which sacrifices a high rate of fire in exchange for the ability to use the deadly ammunition captured from the Adeptus Mechanicus testing facility on the neighbouring forge world, Voldermacht. All shootas used in this scenario have the following profile:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Range</th>
<th>Str</th>
<th>AP</th>
<th>Type</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>18&quot;</td>
<td>5</td>
<td>3</td>
<td>Assault 1</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

Imperial Force

Surprise Assault

The first the Orks knew of the Space Marine attack was when the Thunderhawk Claditus burst through the waterfall at the mouth of Zanzag's lair, guns blazing. The havoc that ensued was utter chaos and it took a good while before Zanzag could restore order. To represent the effects of the Space Marine ambush, the Ork player must set up first. Despite this, the Space Marine player still takes the first turn. Due to their surprise, all Ork units are at -1 Ld for the first turn of the game. Make sure it counts!

"Wuzzat?" said Zanzag to himself, his mutilated face creased in concentration as he put the finishing touches to his twin-linked supashoota. There was a deeper rumble underscoring the roar of the waterfall obscuring the front of the cavern, and it seemed to be getting louder.

"Oh! Wuzzat! Get over 'ere!" shouted Zanzag, "Yo've got da biggest ears of da lo! Wat do you make of that rumblin' noise?"

The big-ored runt scurried forward. "Probly jus' that squig curry wot..."

The unfortunate Gretchin didn't have a chance to finish his sentence before he came apart in an explosion of bone and black blood. Emerging through the waterfall was a gigantic spacecraft, brash and glittering, the breastplate of a blundering Ork's skull slap-presumably their leader. Emerging through the waterfall was a gigantic spacecraft, brash and glittering, the breastplate of a blundering Ork's skull slap-presumably their leader.

"Looks like they found us laze," shouted Zanzag ever the deafening din of the Thunderhawk's guns. "Grab yer shootas and give 'em hell!"

SUB STORIES

The datasheet for Ork Submersibles can be found in WD344. We found that it was fun and easy to make an Ork Sub and, because of the ramshackle nature of Ork machinery, a credible model can be scratch-built with but an afternoon's work. The Studio's submersibles were built from lengths of pipe, discarded bottles and plastic cups, which were then suitably adorned with guns, plastic shields and a liberal sprinkling of Orkly know-wot's.
SCENARIO THREE

THE BEAST AT BAY

This mission is played with 1500 points per side, which includes the contents of Assault on Black Reach.

The Space Marine strike force has inflicted terrible casualties upon Zanzag's forces, but Captain Sicarius will settle for nothing less than killing Zanzag once and for all. As they are fighting their way clear of Zanzag's underground hideout, the Ultramarines find that Zanzag has fled through the tunnels at the rear of the cavern. They plunge into the tunnels in hot pursuit. Just as the Warboss tastes the sweet air of freedom, the remaining Ultramarines emerge from the minehead on the other side of the mountains and bring him to bay. There can only be one victor, as the maddened Orks prepare to sell their lives dearly.

Objective: Seize and Destroy

The player who controls the most table quarters at the end of the game wins. To control a table quarter, a player must have a scoring unit within the zone (see map, below), with no enemy units contesting it. A squad can only ever control one table quarter – if a scoring unit straddles several zones, the controlling player must choose which one they are contesting.

If Sicarius is killed, the Ork player adds one to the number of table quarters he has claimed. If Zanzag is killed, the Space Marine player adds one to the number of table quarters he has claimed. The winner of the game receives one Campaign Point.
An extra Campaign Point is awarded if a player manages to take down his enemy's war leader (Sicarius or Zanzag). Remember to keep track of how many Campaign Points you have accrued. At the end of this game, the winner of the campaign is the player with the most Campaign Points.

Set-up
1. The table is divided into four quarters.
2. The players roll off, and the winner chooses one of the quarters as his deployment zone. He then deploys his forces in that quadrant of the table, ensuring no models are within 12" of the centre of the table.
3. The other player then deploys his own forces, ensuring no models are within 12" of the centre of the table.
4. Units may choose to use their infiltrate or scout abilities.
5. The players roll off, and the winner chooses whether to go first or second.

Game Length
At the end of Turn 5, roll a dice – on the result of a 1 or 2 the game ends, if any other result is rolled the game continues. At the end of Turn 6, roll a dice – on the result of a 1-4 the game ends, if any other result is rolled the game continues for one final turn.

Winning the Campaign
Once all three games have been played, tot up the amount of Campaign Points that each side has accrued. The player that has the most Campaign Points is the overall winner. His opponent must refer to him as Most Victorious Excellency for the rest of the day, and can rest easy knowing that Black Reach has been saved/despoiled by their hand.

Now turn the page to see the Beast at Bay mission played out by old gaming rivals Phil Kelly and Matt Hutson.

"Beast! Come out and fight, beast!" shouted Captain Sicarius, blood coating one side of his face. Dried in abstract patterns like a map of the shattered world. In the darkness of the subterranean tunnels, Sicarius swung his blade left and right and in short but vicious slashes. "I have your death here at the point of my sword!" His speech was interrupted by Sergeant Octavian’s clipped tones. "Brother-Captain, Squad Helios are reporting sunlight from the other side, and a crevace wide enough even for Brother Agnatho to negotiate. Shall I begin the muster?" "Do so at once," replied Sicarius. Within the hour they had caught up with Squad Helios, and Sicarius was striding confidently forward into the vanguard of his force. Sunlight streamed from the minehead in front of them, and Sicarius’ eyes opened wide as he saw Zanzag and his retinue loping towards them. "We have them! Ultramarines, engage and destroy!"

Special Rule:
PROMETHIUM PIPELINE
A conduit for Ghospora Hive’s fuel supplies, this pipeline is hundreds of miles long and, since the orbital bombardment, it has become damaged extensively. The promethium pipeline is counted as difficult terrain that confers a 4+ cover save. Occasionally, great gouts of flame shoot from ruptures in the pipeline. To represent this, infantry models that end any turn on top of the pipeline must roll a dice, taking a wound on the roll of a 1.
The Beast At Bay

It’s the gripping, climactic battle to the Black Reach campaign; can Captain Sicarius slay Warboss Zanzag and halt the green tide?
For the battle report this month we couldn't resist playing one of the Black Reach scenarios from Phil Kelly's campaign. The third scenario in the campaign, representing the final assault on Zanzag's retinue amidst the ruined landscape of Black Reach, was perfect (full scenario details can be found on the previous pages).

The scenario is not only exciting as it forms the concluding act to the campaign, but from a tactical perspective the players will be starting with the core of their force dictated by the contents of the Black Reach box. Both commanders can then bulk out their force from their respective codexes to the 1500-point limit. Taking a predetermined force and then adding to it to match your style of play makes for an interesting challenge. Do you try to complement what's already there to get a balanced, overarching force? Or do you use the remaining points to create a more specialised, separate contingent with a specific task in mind?

To get the most out of these tactical challenges we asked two old adversaries to reprise their long-standing rivalry. Phil Kelly would take the role of Zanzag - Phil, as some of you will be aware, wrote the Ork Codex, so is more than qualified at getting the best out of the greenskins. Facing him, in the blue corner, is White Dwarf stalwart and man with an unhealthy Space Marine obsession, Matt Hutson. Phil and Matt have played one another many times and have chalked up roughly the same amount of victories against each other - although Phil always seems to win in print.

Can Matt break this jinx and lead Captain Sicarius to victory over Zanzag? Let's find out...
Ultramarines Strike Force

Matt: Games against Phil are like buses – you wait for ages then two come along at once. Although this is a big game in its own right, it's somewhat of a prelude to the Studio Warhammer 40,000 tournament semi-final, in which Phil is also using Orks.

The core of my force is made up of the Assault on Black Reach Space Marines. The Tactical Squad's Missile launcher and flamer combination is perfect for fighting Orks. Missile launchers are particularly good against Orks as a Krak missile can easily knock out a Trukk, while the new rules for blast weapons means a frag missile can potentially kill a lot of Orks.

I was somewhat dubious about the effectiveness of the Dreadnought's multi-melta against Orks as I would usually go for something better at killing swathes of greenskins, like an assault cannon. Still, there is no doubting the Dreadnought's close combat prowess, and I wouldn't mind getting him close to that Ork Warboss.

I've always liked taking Terminators in my Space Marine forces so I've added a second five-man squad to the Black Reach ones. To add some extra bite, I've given the squads an assault cannon and a heavy flamers. All I did was swap a Black Reach Terminator and a heavy weapon Terminator between the squads.

"Having played against Phil and his Orks on numerous occasions, I knew that I was going to be in for a rough time."

Because Matt's been busy painting his Red Corsairs we struggled to get him back into the loyalist mindset. So much so that he kept shouting out "Death to the Emperor" at inopportune times throughout the game.
Against Orks you can guarantee that they will make it into close combat at some point, so you'd better make sure that you have something to counter-attack with – the Terminators and Dreadnought will be perfect for this.

Now, the new edition of Warhammer 40,000 is all about Troops choices. To ensure that I could claim objectives, I'm going to need some more squads. A second Tactical Squad armed with a flamethrower and heavy bolter, and two squads of Scouts should do the trick. The Scouts are particularly useful, as their infiltrate ability will enable them to pop up where they are least expected.

Now for some heavy firepower. Having been trounced last time I fought Phil in a battle report, my conclusion was that I should have taken a Whirlwind so that I could kill Orks from afar – so that's exactly what I'm going to do this time. My second selection is a Devastator Squad equipped with two heavy bolters and two missile launchers. The mission for these two units is a simple one: sit back in the deployment zone and kill as many Orks as possible.

Lastly I added a Librarian to fight alongside my Captain. I've taken the psychic power Fury of the Ancients for him so that hopefully if I get him into a good position I can affect multiple Ork units and maybe even pin any understrength mobs that get hit.

Having played against Phil and his horde of Orks on numerous occasions, I knew that I was going to be in for a rough time. If I can just weather the first wave of Orks without losing too many of my Space Marines, and then make an effective counter-attack, I might just be in with a chance at beating him.
ZANZAG’S BOYZ

Phil: I’ve always preferred an army with lots of good honest infantry, but this time I decided to treat myself to some of the more elite choices available in the Ork list. The new plastic Nobz in the Assault on Black Reach boxed game will make an ideal retinue for Zanzag (I can’t wait to see the new Ork Warboss in action – just look at that klaw!). The background for this last battle specified that the Space Marines had driven most of Zanzag’s forces off, so Da Boss was down to his most trusted lieutenants – a good reason to stick with the Nobz theme, I thought, adding a trio of Meganobz and a unit of seven more big green killing machines to ride alongside them. This latter squad will go into battle with a Waragh! banner, so they will be hitting Matt’s Space Marines on a 3+ – very nasty when you factor in the power klaws and all those S5 attacks from the Nobz with furious charge. A Painboy, though expensive, gives this deluxe Nobz unit the feel no pain special rule – invaluable when the bolter shells start flying. But how to ensure that my charges are furious? Simple enough – Trukks. I never go into battle with less than three Trukks, because even though your opponent should easily take out one, and maybe even two, it is rare that he can bag all three in one Shooting phase. A Big Mek with a kustom force field generator should help my scary-lookin’ first wave, effectively giving the Trukks a 4+ save from Matt’s gun-line. With a bit of clever deployment and reckless driving, at least one of my Nobz mobs will be in the thick of Matt’s troops on Turn 2, allowing my footlogging horde to close in whilst the Space Marines are busy avoiding having their limbs sheared off by Ork power klaws.

The new version of 40K practically demands lots of Troops choices, so I spent a good lump of my remaining points on three big 20-strong units of Boyz – my weapon of choice these days. It’s amazing how much punishment those nice fat units of greenskins can soak up, even when facing off against those fearsome Space Marine Devastator Squads and Tactical Marine tag-teams.

I also took a unit of Gretchin – lovely little nuisances that they are – to skulk at the back and claim objectives whilst their larger cousins get on with all the real work, and some Shoota-toting Boyz to thicken my mobile firepower.

Finally, I included some valuable (and extremely mobile) anti-tank firepower in the shape of the new Deffkoptas – wonderful models and very nippy due to their scout special rule. It will be their job to take on Matt’s Dreadnought and stop the indomitable walker from tying up my more vulnerable units – not such a difficult task with those twin-linked rokkit launchers and enough zoom to get round the flanks and rear nice and quickly. This is set to be a good game – ol’ Zanzag’s not going down without a fight!
Phil had won the dice roll to go first but, before he could even pull out his tape measure, Matt tried to seize the initiative and cast the first turn away from the Orks. Matt failed to roll the requisite 6 – the Ork lust for battle trumping any kind of tactical acumen from the Space Marines.

The Ork's surged forward in two prongs. Painboy Skubgutz’s Nobz went north towards the burning promethium line and the formidable guns of Squad Xerxes. Zanzag and his ladz, along with the Meganobz, rode eastwards in their Trukks, taking a more direct route towards the Ultramarines lines. The rest of the horde followed as fast as they could. The few exceptions were Garfaq’s Shootas who advanced more cautiously in the south and the Grots seemed more than happy to loiter in the deployment zone. The Defikoptas were already deep in the north-western quarter thanks to their pre-game scout move.

The Orks mainly used the Shooting phase to run closer to the enemy (A). There was some sporadic shooting, the Meganobz firing their twin-linked Shootas at the Devastators to no avail. The Defikoptas tried their luck by firing off a few rokkits at the Dreadnought but the over-eager Kopita pilots were out of range.

As expected, there was very little movement in the Space Marines’ first turn. However, the Terminators of Squad Xerxes strode forward, undaunted by the sheer mass of Orks that were rapidly approaching. Advancing parallel to them on the other side of the promethium pipe was Squad Auros, closely followed by the Librarian. The Dreadnought moved south, bringing his deadly multi-melta within range of the Ork Trukks. Sicarius, accompanied by Squad Solinus, manoeuvred south ready to face the greenskin onslaught.

The Space Marine Shooting phase started with the Scouts of Squad Prelius targeting the Deffkoptas with their sniper rifles and missile launcher. The missile struck the intervening terrain, but a well-placed shot from a sniper rifle hit a fuel tank, sending one of the Deffkoptas spinning out of control and plunging to the ground (B). First blood to the Adeptus Astartes! The two surviving Deffkoptas failed their morale test and quickly withdrew to relative safety behind the burning promethium pipe. The Dreadnought’s multi-melta was next to fire, the blast of super-heated air striking the Ork Trukk that was carrying Skugutz’s Boyz, instantly turning it into bubbling, molten slag (C).

The rest of the Space Marine force fired into the Orks at the forefront of the advance. However, the Big Mek’s expensive kustom force field came into its own. Despite the sheer amount of firepower from the combined mass of bolters and missiles, the Orks came out of the Shooting phase relatively unscathed. Much to Matt’s frustration, Phil just kept making the cover saves granted by the Mek’s force field. The only notable casualties were two dead Boyz of Arghag’s Mob from a Whirlwind barrage.

"Phil just kept making the cover saves granted by the Mek’s force field."
ORK TURN 2

ZANZAG'S WAAAGH!

The Orks had fared well against the Space Marine firepower in the previous turn and so Phil sought to take full advantage of this. Painboy Skubahutz's Nobz continued to advance towards the Terminators of Squad Xerxes. The intact Trukks – one carrying Zanzag and his Nobz, the other transporting the Meganobz – sped east, ever closer to the Ultramarines. Phil dubbed these mobs "the first wave." The rest of the greenskin horde, with a few notable exceptions, followed. Hakkef's Mob, Hedkicker's Mob and Mek Know-wotz pursued the Nobz north along the pipeline towards the Terminators. In the south Garfag's Shootas hunkered down behind some terrain, while the Grotz and Deffkoptas continued to mill about in the south-western quarter.

As the Shooting phase began, Phil didn't hesitate and immediately declared the WAAAGH! Bellowing for the charge, Zanzag launched himself off the Trukk, closely followed by his bodyguard of Nobz. The Warboss headed straight for Sicarius, stopping an inch short and leaving no doubts as to his intended target in the

The Orks of Hedkicker's squad surround the Terminators, desperate to get into the fight and grab some glory. upcoming Assault phase. The clunking armour of the Meganobz meant they didn’t quite have the same momentum – Phil only rolled a one for their run roll. In the north, Skubgutz’s Nobz and Hedkicka’s Mob spurred forward so they were easily within assault range of the Terminators.

Realising they were still too far from “da ackshun,” Hakkellf’s Boyz snapped off sluga shots and launched their rokkilz, firing through Hedkicka’s Mob into the Terminators. The majority of the shots missed or pinged off ceramite armour, although one lukey sluga round hit home and felled a Terminator! Back in the east, the gunners on both the Ork Trukks couldn’t match their enthusiasm with accuracy and instead fired their weapons wildly into the air, missing their Space Marine targets.

With the Assault phase on the horizon, Phil became notably more animated as he gathered together all the dice in preparation. Matt kept his cool but was under no illusion that this would hurt, potentially blunting Scuriarius’ attack before it had properly begun. The combat started with the Meganobz charging into Squad Vorolanus. The Ultramarines were faster than the cumbersome Orks and sprang into action, causing four wounds. The Meganobz’ armour proved too resilient for the combat knives and bolt pistols of the Tactical Marines as Phil made all his saves. The power klaw had no such trouble with Space Marine power armour and the Meganobz slaughtered their way through six Ultramarines. The survivors of Squad Vorolanus fell back, guns ready to avenge their fallen brothers.

Zanzag grinned wildly as he and his Nobz pilled into Squad Solinus and Scuriarius. The fight quickly turned into a desperate melee. Scuriarius struck first, despatching a Nob with his power sword. The Tactical Space Marines slew another. The Orks fought back, buoyed up by the momentum of the charge, the Nobz killing three Ultramarines with the crude blades of their choppas. Finally, the Warboss prepared to strike, his power klaw cracking with wisps of energy. “Well, if the Warlord misses it’s going to be jolly dramatic,” said Phil without a hint of irony. He then proceeded to miss with all his to hit rolls – that’s what you get for trying to sound like one of the Famous Five, Phil!

The final combat in the phase saw the outnumbered Terminators of Squad Xerxes fending off the Nobz and Hedkicka’s Boyz. Sergeant Xerxes calmly decapitated one of the Nobz as it advanced into range. The remaining Nobz were unflazed and inflicted an impressive five wounds, all of which were saved by thick Terminator armour. The Boyz attacked next and were more successful, slaying two of the 1st Company Ultramarines. The power klaw and fists then powered up. The Terminators crushed another two Ork skulls but the four power klaw-armied Nobz still in the combat proved the Space Marines’ undoing and Squad Xerxes was wiped out.
The Terminators Fight Back

In the south-west the Scouts of Squad Bedium entered the battlefield along the flank, their intention was clearly to steal a table quarter away from the Orks. Phil was wise to the scheme, though, and made no secret where his Defikoptas planned to go in Turn 3.

The remaining Space Marine moves were based around countering the "first wave" attack. The Dreadnought turned east and lumbered towards the Meganobz, while Squad Vorolanus' surviving members reformed into a better firing position. Most importantly, the five Terminators of Squad Authoris mounted the promethium pipe, heedless of the fires around them. In fact, Matt had his own plan involving flares as he brought the squad's heavy flamer to bear on the mass of greenskins below.

The Librarian also moved over the pipeline and immediately cast Storm of the Emperor's Wrath at the Nobz. The psychic power hit but once again Phil "Cover Save" Kelly made his saving throws.

The shooting started with Squad Authoris bathing Hedickka's Boyz in flame and storm bolter fire. Seven Orks were either incinerated or riddled with bolter shells. The Dreadnought targeted the Meganobz with its deadly multi-melta. The heat ray hit one of them, transforming the mega armour and the Nob inside into a heap of molten slag.

The combat ends in another stalemate, with three wounds taken on both sides.

The combat ends in another stalemate, with three wounds taken on both sides.

Ultermarines Movement Phase
Heavy fire poured from the Devastators into the mob of Nobz. Despite the concentration of heavy boiler and missile fire, no casualties were taken as Skugz the Painboy performed acts of triage that only an Ork could withstand — and they did. The Whirlwind fired on Arghaz’s Mob in the centre of the battlefield. The Slugga Boyz no longer benefited from the kustom force field as the Mek had moved out of range, and six were slain by the thunderous barrage.

In the Assault phase the Dreadnought strode into combat with the two remaining Megazozb. It despatched the two armoured Nobz with the ruthless efficiency that only comes with centuries of experience in combat. The ancient machine then consolidated south towards the Trukks and the ongoing combat between Sicarius and Zanzag.

The Terminators of Squad Authos, along with the Librarian, charged off the pipeline and into combat with Hedkicker’s Boyz, intent on revenge for their fallen 1st Company brothers. The combat was brutal and deadly but the Orks, although more numerous, had been robbed of their momentum and their bonus from furious charge. The Terminator Sergeant and Librarian struck first, slaying three. The Boyz then hit back causing six wounds, all of which were saved. Hedkicker’s power klaw raked across the Terminators and caused two wounds, but this time it was Matt who couldn’t fail his rolls and made all the invulnerable saves needed. The Terminators’ own power fists then crushed a further two Orks. The Boyz had lost and subsequently failed their Morale test. Phil used the bosspole to try and restore order (inflicting another wound on the mob in the process) but failed the test again. The Ultramarine Terminators wiped out the mob, claiming vengeance before consolidating back over the promethium pipeline to the north.

The final combat revolved around the two commanders and their accompanying retinues. The Space Marines, including Sicarius, caused a wound on the last Nob, who seemed overwhelmed by this assault and failed to hit his power-armoured foes at all. Zanzag made up for his dismal performance in the previous turn by slaughtering three Ultramarines and forcing another draw. The epic combat continued.
Garfag's Shoota Boyz became impatient with skulking around the ruins in the south where all the action was clearly taking place further north. And so they left the safety of the cover and advanced towards the busier end of the battlefield.

Across the table to the far west, the Grots and Defikoptas had turned to advance upon the recently arrived Scouts. The Defikoptas flew at great speed, eager to confront this new target. The Trukks were also on the move again and, with some surprisingly deft driving, the Ork vehicles spun round behind the Dreadnought, giving their gunner's a clear shot at the machine's weaker rear armour. The Ork gunners didn't hesitate, and opened fire - though one missed, the other hit the Dreadnought, but still couldn't penetrate the armoured sarcophagus.

keeping his ladz alive, also missed, although this was understandable as it must be quite hard trying to find a suitable place to insert the ‘ury syringe when your target is encased in Terminator armour! Once again it came down to a clash between the power fists and power klaw. Both Phil and Matt rolled high and after the dust had cleared all that was left was a solitary Terminator and the Librarian – the Nobz and Painboy had been wiped out. The survivors consolidated southwards, back over the pipeline.

The fighting between Sicarius and Zanzag became all the more intense as their retinues were ever more depleted. Sicarius despatched another Nob, but Zanzag’s patience obviously wore thin as his power klaw cleaved through all the remaining Tactical Marines, leaving Sicarius to face the Ork alone. Nevertheless the Ultramarines Captain held his ground, ready to face his nemesis in bloody one-on-one combat.

THE LEADERS’ FIGHT

The monumental struggle between Zanzag’s Ladz and Squad Solinus continues into its third phase. As the numbers dwindle, the two respective heroes seek each other out for the final reckoning.

Terminators, but all shots missed. Arghaz’s Sluggas, positioned in the centre of the table, were also wide when firing at the Devastators, only managing to draw attention to themselves! In the west, the Gretchin finally did something more than just linger about, and fired at Squad Bedium. Being better shots than their larger cousins, the Grots managed to bring down two Scouts. The Deffkoptas also fired at the same target and killed another, much to Matt’s annoyance.

In the Assault phase the Deffkoptas hovered low, churning up the ground and anything else that happened to be in the way of their rotor blades, including the Ultramarines Scouts. The Ork contraptions lurched forward and sliced the last two members of Squad Bedium to pieces.

The Nobz charged forward into Squad Authos. The Terminators seemed to forget they were fighting for their lives as both the Sergeant and Librarian missed. The Painboy, who had been performing well
ZANZAG'S FINAL SCRAP

In the far north the Scouts of Squad Prelus moved into the cover of the ruins. The Librarian and the sole remaining Terminator advanced south and made ready for a confrontation with the Boyz of Hakleff's Mob.

The Shooting phase commenced with the Devastators targeting the recently emerged Shoota Boyz in the south. The combined missile and heavy bolter fire whittled the Ork Shootas to half their number, and the remaining five Boyz scurried off the table.

The Librarian summoned his psychic force and cast Fury of the Ancients, blasting its way through the remaining Slugga mobz, killing two from each. The Terminator fired his storm bolter into the ensuing destruction, but while both shots wounded, the infernal kustom force field prevented them becoming casualties.

The Whirlwind launched its third salvo into the Ork lines, specifically at Argbag's Mob in the centre. The barrage hit seven Orks and wounded five. With no cover or force field to protect them, all the slain Orks were removed from play.

Squad Vorolanus readied weapons and fired into the side of an Ork Trukk. The vehicle was penetrated and careened back towards the Space Marines on a collision course with the Whirlwind. The Trukk crashed before it could reach the Ultramarine vehicle, although the resulting explosion took a nearby Devastator with it.

The Assault phase was obviously going to be another bloody one as the Terminator and Librarian charged into the mob of Ork Boyz, and the Dreadnought gate-crashed the ongoing combat between Sicarius and Zanzag. The sheer weight of numbers proved too much for the Librarian and Terminator; an Ork Boy was slain but then the Terminator was subjected to 18 attacks back. Only two were wounding hits, but Matt failed one of his saves and Squad Aethos was no more. The Librarian saw off all seven attacks against him, but the Nob's power klaw claimed the Ultramarines psyker. Hakleff's mob celebrated their victory by consolidating onto the pipeline. Not the wisest manoeuvre; as two of the Boyz were burnt to death by the flaming promethium leaking from the pipe.

In their ongoing struggle, Sicarius struck first against Zanzag, but missed with all of his attacks. The Dreadnought wasted no time, as it ploughed into battle, picking up the Ork in its massive power fist and ripping the Warboss apart! The last remaining Ork Nob was incensed at the death of his boss, and promptly struck down Sicarius! Both sides had lost their commanders in the same combat.

SHOOTAS

Earlier in the game, Phil had placed his unit of Shoota Boyz behind cover in the south-west quarter of the table, ready to claim or contest that area. Tactically it would have made sense to keep them out of sight but, in the heat of battle, Phil often finds himself not just controlling the Orks but playing like one as well. So they came into the open looking for a fight, only to be shot to pieces by Matt’s Devastator Squad!
Hakdeff’s mob began Turn 4 by moving north, on the hunt for the Space Marine Scouts. In the east the Grots continued to hunker down behind the pipeline. The Defikoptas, having disposed of the Scouts, then flew west as fast as they could.

The Ork shooting phase was typically characterful of their race as everything missed apart from one lucky shot by one of the Slugga Boyz in the centre of the table, which wounded a Devastator.

With the shooting out of the way Hakdeff’s Boyz piled into the Scouts. The Ultramarines slew an Ork before they were subjected to 24 attacks back, five of which wounded. Matt made good on his saves and only one Scout was lost. The Nob then hit out with his power klaw and killed another two. The surviving Scouts withdrew towards the western edge.

In the Space Marine turn the only movement was from the hardworking Dreadnought, which made its way towards the remaining Ork Trukk. With another blast of the multi-melta, the final Ork vehicle was destroyed. The Devastators targeted the Slugga Boyz in the centre, and when the smoke had cleared from the intense shooting four more Ork Boyz lay dead. The Whirlwind tried to target the Grots as Matt needed to wipe them out to prevent Phil claiming the quarter. However, for the first time in the game, the barrage scattered well wide of the mark.

GROTS

Gretchin, also known as Grots by their Orky masters, may not be the most powerful troops at a Warboss’ disposal, but they do have their uses. Not only are they the best shots in the Ork list with a BS of 3, they are found in the Troops section of the army and so can hold objectives, as they are doing here, securing Phil a table quarter.

TURN 5

WIPE 'EM OUT!

Turn 5 saw both players with extremely diminished forces, the onslaught of fire and combat having taken its toll on both armies.

In the Ork Movement phase Phil continued to fly his Deffkoptas west. The only other move occurred when Argbag's Mob finally decided it would be best to get into some deep cover.

The Koptas fired their rokkits at Brother Agnathio but failed to penetrate the Dreadnought's thick armour. Argbag's Boyz shot at the Devastators, but missed in a typical display of Orky inaccuracy.

In the Space Marine turn the Dreadnought moved south-west, goading the Deffkoptas to attack it. It fired its multi-melta and Matt took great satisfaction at blowing up another Ork vehicle and the thought of the Deffkopta falling out of the sky. The Devastators fired at Argbag's Boyz but the cover proved too dense and no wounds were taken. Finally, the Whirlwind launched a barrage at the Gretchin again but it fell wide once more. A single dice was then rolled to see if the game ended - the result was a 2, and the battle was over.

Both sides had taken heavy losses and both had lost their leaders, but the day belonged to the greenskins. However, with Zanzag no longer at the head of the Wasagh! it would only be a matter of time before the world of Black Reach could be cleansed of the Ork menace.

SECOND OPINION

We asked White Dwarf's Andy Hall for his thoughts on the battle:

Andy: It was another hard fought battle between Phil and Matt. The balance shifted considerably from one side to the other, especially in the early turns. For the Ultramarines the Dreadnought proved the star, the multi-melta really came into its own despite Matt's concerns about the Dreadnought's armament before the battle commenced.

Although the Orks were victorious, Phil did make the odd mistake — getting Zanzag killed is the obvious one, but that wasn't really Phil's fault (that Dreadnought again). It was moving the Shoota Boyz into the open only to get shot up for no real tactical gain that was the real blunder. Still, the Orks won the battle and it's the result that everybody remembers!

Matt: That was really close — typical of my games against Phil. By Turn 5, all the remaining Orks could do was hunker down in cover and hope the game ended at the earliest opportunity.

My counter-attack after the first wave of Orks hit worked perfectly, in particular the Dreadnought was awesome, the mega armoured Orks didn't stand a chance. The second unit of Terminators executed a perfect hit and run over the pipeline to eliminate a mob of Orks. My concerns that the Dreadnought's multi-melta armament wasn't right for fighting Orks was thrown out of the door the minute it scored 18 for it's armour penetration against a Trukk. In fact, the Dreadnought almost single-handedly won the game for me by destroying everything it targeted.

So where did it all go wrong? Sicarius let me down with his inability to do more than one wound a turn and then, when the combat was all but won thanks to the intervention of the Dreadnought, he added insult to injury by freezing to a single lonely Ork Nob and costing me a vital victory point. A confrontation with the Warboss's power klaw though would have brought about an earlier end to this combat, and no amount of badgering from Phil was going to make this confrontation happen.

So apart from passing a few more armour saves what would I have done differently? A bigger Scout squad might have been able to hold off the Deffkoptas or failing that shooting them earlier would have done the trick! As the game was really close, a single on-target Whirlwind shot against the Grots could have swung it my way but it wasn't to be.

Next time I fight Phil I will hopefully have the new Space Marine Codex to play with and maybe have a few new tricks up my sleeves to use.
Da Boyz Done Good

Phil: Well that was a blast, even before stuff started exploding. I really enjoy those games where it looks like you’re going to get shot to pieces, but you hang in there, and in the end the Boyz come through for you. It’s typical of the games Matt and I play – I take an early lead, then Matt counterattacks and hits great chunks out my army, and we’re left with a really tense end game which swings back and forth to a bloody conclusion.

So what swung it my way this time? Well, my Trukk plan worked well enough – I certainly got the Boyz into combat nice and early with a second-turn Waagh! The Nobz charged in and battered a lot of Tactical Marines into the ground, but Matt proved more than equal to the task of holding steady and containing the sudden outbreak of bellowing green-skinned aliens in his lines. The subsequent counterattack was devastating – losing all three of my Meganobz to the Dreadnought in one fell swoop was a real shame, and the walker went on to be a real thorn in my side for the rest of the game. To think I’d discounted the multi-melta-toting Dread as “not that big a deal” – I learned my lesson the hard way! More Tankbustas next time, I think – bomb-squigs just love to play with those big friendly Dreadnoughts.

Still, the Deffkoptas saw off Matt’s Scouts and there were enough Boyz left at the end to hold onto those table quarters, so regardless of my many casualties I still managed a win.

The duel between Sicarius and Zanzag went on for ages – or should I say the duel between their units. For some reason Matt seemed reluctant to get his Captain into base contact with my power-klaw wielding Warboss. Pfah! Stinkin’ human, using one of them tactics on me. I got him in the end though – just as the dreaded Dreadnought stormed in to tip the finely-balanced combat by squishing Zanzag into a paste, the last Nob of the Warboss’ retinue lucked out and took down Sicarius in a single combat round. Bosh!

The Deffkoptas were invaluable, due to their speed and ability to fly over intervening terrain.

CINEMATIC ACTION

Games of 40K are always action-packed. There will be many moments that are very cinematic, bits of action you’d love to see up on the big screen. For this battle we thought the most dramatic point happened when Squad Xerxes was wiped out by the Ork Nobz. But before the greenskins could truly celebrate, the Terminators of Squad Author appeared on top of the burning pipeline to dish out righteous retribution with heavy flamers and storm bolters. They then wiped out the Orks in assault before withdrawing back over the promethium. Truly a classic 40K “movie moment!”
The last twelve months have seen Warhammer 40,000 being played on a whole new scale. Andy Hall takes a look at Apocalypse one year on.

If you added together the casualties from all the Warhammer 40,000 games that take place in a typical year, then no doubt it would be a massive number. Now, if you did the same thing for the last twelve months, you'd have a truly astronomical figure. Why the increase? Well, the Apocalypse happened...

We all knew that Apocalypse was going to be a hit. What we didn't quite realise was just how much hobbyists would take gaming on a massive scale into their hearts. All around the world, reports have filtered in of mass destruction on a suitably apocalyptic scale. Whole battalions of Imperial Guard have been lost. The massed firepower of super-heavy vehicles has slaughtered so many Gaunts that they have blunted entire Hive Fleet tendrils. Daemons have been banished back to the Warp in numbers large enough to make even Khorne blush. Never has a project been more aptly named than Apocalypse!

It was always the plan that the Apocalypse book would be just the beginning; a tone of information gathered from experienced gamers on how to set up and run massive games, while the few rules included essentially gave you permission to ignore the Codex restrictions. The datasheets in the book offer a brief glimpse of the huge super-heavy vehicles and the many battle formations that exist in the 41st Millennium, and loads more have... been published in White Dwarf, online and by the busy chaps at Forge World.

Twelve months after the expansion's release, we find Apocalypse in fine fettle, as the recent appearance of the Apocalypse: Reload book is proof if proof were needed. The starting point for Reload was to simply publish as many datasheets as we could get away with. But, as with everything in the Studio, it evolved beyond its original brief and turned into more of a companion tome to Apocalypse – an expansion to an expansion, if you will. Yes, you still get loads of datasheets; the Stormlord super-heavy tank, Skyhammer Orbital Strike Force, The Phoenix Court of Khaine, Tetragon of Darkness and the Behemoth Crusher Brood being just a few examples of what you'll find.

There's far more than the datasheets though. The new book contains dozens of brand new strategic assets, three of which can be used by any force, just like the assets in the main Apocalypse book. However, the majority of the new assets are specific to certain armies. These represent strategies that only that race would or could field. So, while there's nothing wrong when an Ork player decides to take the Careful Planning asset, it'll be much more satisfying for him to pick Da Big Waaagh!

Of course, we couldn't let an Apocalypse book leave the Studio without Jervis nabbing some pages, and he's filled them with loads of cool optional rules and

Apocalypse and 5th Edition

New rules such as running and going to ground really help infantry out. Blast weapons get a boost too – so long as you target a high concentration of troops, you’re bound to hit something!

The most noticeable change that effects Apocalypse is that only Troops count as scoring units now. This new ruling plays well, but doesn’t sit perfectly with the wording in the Apocalypse book. The easy solution is to either play it as written in the new edition of the game, or say that for your Apocalypse battle all units count as scoring units. It doesn’t matter which method you use, as long as it is made clear to all the players before the game begins. Each option will give you a tactically different challenge.

Apocalypse: Reload discusses this in more detail.

I was at Glasgow Conflict recently – a wonderful event that’s well worth attending if you get the chance – and while there quite a few people came over to ask me about what was happening with the Specialist Games range. After answering the question for the umpteenth time, it occurred to me that I really should write a Standard Bearer on the subject, to bring everyone up to speed on our plans for this great range of games.

For those of you that don’t know, the Specialist Games range consists of a selection of really rather wonderful games that you can find on our website. You can download the rulebooks from the website for free, and the Citadel miniatures you need to play the games are available from our online store. I’ve included short descriptions of the different games in the range with this article, but I highly recommend visiting the website to find out more, as there is lots more information there than I can cram into this short article. You may also, if you’re very lucky, find copies of one or more of our Specialist Games at your local Games Workshop stockist; however, since the games have been moved onto our website, such finds are becoming increasingly rare, and because of this I recommend snapping up copies of any of the games you’re interested in if you come across them.

As you may have guessed, I’m a big fan of the Specialist range. Part of this is simply because I’m the designer of some of the games in the range. After all, when you’ve put your heart and soul, and a fair amount of blood, sweat and tears, into making something, you can’t help but take a certain pride in it. However, I really don’t think this is just about vanity. Rather more important is the way that these games add what I tend to call “depth and breadth” to the hobby.

In my opinion the Specialist range deepens the hobby by allowing us to explore the background of our games in ways that Warhammer 40,000 alone cannot. For example, Inquisitor added a huge amount of depth to the role the Inquisition play in the fight against the insidious enemies of the Imperium, while Nordheim explored facets of the Warhammer background that are very different to the pitched battles covered in Warhammer itself. Both of these

The Specialist Games range contains a selection of really rather wonderful games.

Out of Print Games
Over the years, Games Workshop has made many games set in our worlds, such as Bomberz Over Da Sulphur River, and GorkaMorka. A selection of these can be downloaded from our website. Just print them out, grab some suitable miniatures and play.

GORKAMORKA

Control mighty armies thousands strong, backed by huge batteries of devastating war machines and led by the most valiant of heroes as they clash with your mortal enemies across vast expanses of terrain. Witness giants, dragons, and massive creatures clashing on a breathtaking scale.

WARMASTER

In Inquisitor, players take the part of the Imperium’s most powerful and secretive servants. Using 54mm figures, Inquisitor is a narrative wargame, based around humanity’s unending conflict with the alien, the Daemon and the witch – the battle for the Emperor’s Soul.

INQUISITOR

The Battle of Five Armies game recreates the climactic battle from J.R.R. Tolkien’s The Hobbit. In the game, players take command of rival armies of Men, Elves, Dwarves, Goblins and Wargs represented by ranks of intricately detailed models about 10mm tall.

BATTLE OF FIVE ARMIES

In Gorkamorka you can command a horde of goblins and daemons in a crazy mad war for Sol Invictus. Da Boelz is a miniature war game for two players to command units of Gorkamorka and Daemons in a mad war for Sol Invictus.

DA BOELZ

Battlefleet Gothic is the game of spaceship battles. Fleets of monolithic vessels engage in ship-to-ship combat amongst the darkness of the stars.
games—indeed all of the games in the Specialist range—deepen the hobby, and make all aspects of it more interesting and fulfilling. I think that it’s just more fun to play 40K when you’re aware of things like the mile-long battleships described in Battlefleet Gothic, or the huge Titans and Gargants described in Epic Armageddon, at least in my opinion anyway.

But as well as depth, the Specialist range also adds breadth too, by allowing hobbyists to try out different gaming and modelling experiences. On the one hand, games like Necromunda, Blood Bowl and Warmaster offer very different gaming opportunities and styles of play to those offered by The Lord of the Rings strategy battle game, Warhammer, and Warhammer
40,000. On the other hand, games like Battlefleet Gothic, Epic Armageddon and (epecially) Inquisitor allow the dedicated modeller to try their hand at painting and converting models that are very different to the miniatures used in our main games.

These things broaden the hobby experience for us all, increasing the number of different things that hobbyists can discover, try out and explore.

All in all, then, I think that the games and miniatures in the Specialist Games range compliment our other products very well, and make the hobby even more fulfilling, especially for experienced hobbyists who are looking for new challenges and gaming experiences.

Above, Witch Hunters scour the dammed city of Mordheim.

Variety, as they say, is the spice of life! For all of these reasons, we consider the Specialist Games range to be an important part of the Games Workshop hobby and one that we don’t want to see disappear.
Therefore, in order to make sure that doesn’t happen, we’ve come up with a cunning plan to make sure that the Specialist range remains available for the foreseeable future.

Blood Bowl is the game
in which humans, Orcs, Elves, Trolls and many other creatures participate in a bloodthirsty, fantasy sport. Take the role of a Blood Bowl coach
looking to work his team
of psychotic players up through the leagues and then on to win the famed Blood Bowl itself!

Mordheim

in the year of 1999, the twin-tailed comet fell upon the once great city of Mordheim. All that is left are smoking ruins and the mysterious shards known as wyrdstone. Players
take their mercenary warbands into the deserted streets to fight for the precious
wyrdstone shards.

Necromunda Underhive
is a game of fierce combat between rival gangs in the dangerous
underworld of the Necromundan hives.
Gangs must fight to gain territories, wealth and renown. Only when a gang leader is well-known throughout the Underhive can he hope to cross over the Wall
and enter into the hive
city above.

Epic is a game of mass combat. Armies of infantry, legions of tanks
and giant war engines
such as Titans and super-heavy vehicles engage in massive conflicts across entire planets—wars
such as Armageddon,
where the Orks have invaded and only the massed might of the Imperium and numerous
Space Marine Chapters
can stop them.

www.games-workshop.com
As I've already mentioned, the main home for the games in the Specialist range is the new-look Games Workshop website and online store. Just visit the website and follow the links for the Specialist Games range and you will be led to a treasure trove of cool stuff, including copies of the rules that you can download for free, an online store for the Citadel miniatures needed to play the games, and a wide collection of support material and articles about the games that will help you to get the most from them. You can also order miniatures from the Specialist range from the Direct Sales order points we have in our stores, and if you do this any models you order can be collected from the store, post free.

Of course, just having a home for the games in the Specialist range isn’t going to help all that much if people are not aware that the range exists, so the other thing we’ve been working on is a new Specialist Games range catalogue. This is still a work in progress as I type this column, but as long as everything goes to plan it will be out in time for Christmas. The catalogue will be full-colour throughout and will show off all of the Citadel miniatures in the Specialist range. This will, of course, make the catalogue jolly useful for those enlightened individuals that already play the games in the Specialist range, but, speaking personally, I think it’s just as important as a way of making sure that as many people as possible know about these great games and how to get hold of them.

And that, in a nutshell, is our plan for supporting the Specialist range. In the future we hope to be able to add new games and new miniatures to the range, though it has to be said that such things are a long way off right now. However, I know that quite a few of our designers would love to get the chance to make some new Specialist Games range miniatures, and when we get the chance to let them do so, we’ll let you know right here in White Dwarf. Watch this space, as they say! Until then, we already have a fantastic range of Specialist Games for you to choose from, and all these games work brilliantly well with the miniatures that are already available. Just as importantly, these games are going to be kept permanently available for those players that already know and love them, and for the new generations of gamers who have yet to have had the joy of discovering them. The Specialist Games range is here to stay!

As ever, if you have any thoughts, comments or feedback on what you’ve just read, or about the hobby in general, then please write to me. I’d love to hear what you think of the Specialist Games range and our plans for it.
We launched the Modular Movement Trays back in December last year and the kit has proved very popular with hobbyists for customising movement trays to fit their units.

However, the potential of a large gridded plastic sheet has proven too hard to ignore for many modellers and so the modular tray components have been used in ways other than those originally intended. Below is just one method. Not that we're complaining - that's just one of the things that makes the hobby so much fun.

Basing Your Buildings
The following top tip was brought to our attention by Will Bowrey, one of our store managers. He's been using the sheets as sturdy bases for his buildings. The grid looks great as a paved urban environment on a Warhammer 40,000 battlefield, or as ancient slabs of stone as part of a Warhammer terrain set. The two examples shown here, constructed and painted by Alan Merrett, illustrate what you can achieve with a minimum of fuss.

First, cut your base to the desired size using the same method as described on the right. Then, weather the base. This is simply a case of using a good, sharp Hobby Knife to cut and score the edges of the base sheet to create suitable cracks in the paving or chips in the stone. How much weathering you do is entirely up to you, although it is best to diminish the base edges so they don't look too stark against your tabletop. Once you have assembled your building or terrain piece you can stick it to the base, adding sand and rubble (which can be made out of spare bits from your modular tray kit - chopping up the tray edging and corners or any spare base cast-offs) adds to the effect, just as Alan has done here. Then simply undercoat and paint your based up terrain. Static grass, lichen and flock can be added as finishing touches.

Creating Movement Trays
It's really easy to create movement trays with the modular system, here's a quick recap on how to make them:

1. Mark out the size you want your tray to be. Don't forget the sheet is double sided - one side has a 25mm grid, the other has 20mm squares.

2. Place the sheet flat on a cutting mat and use a saw to cut along the marked grooves. You don't need to cut all the way through as, once you have scored the plastic, you can carefully snap it.

3. When you have the sheet cut to the desired size, it's best to stick the two corners on first with Plastic Glue. Now attach the straight edges, by measuring the gap between the corners and then cutting the straight edge pieces to fit.

If you have a quick hobby tip that you'd like to share, why not write to us at the usual address? Who knows, it might end up being the subject of a future White Dwarf or web article!
For this month's Painting Workshop we're going to focus on how to assemble and paint your Assault on Black Reach models. We'll also be paying particular attention to the Space Marine Terminator and Ork Nob you've received free with this very issue.

The great thing about push-fit models, such as those you get in Black Reach, is that they're very easy to assemble and so you can get them ready to play on the tabletop in no time at all. However, after your first couple of games you're going to want to paint them up.

To assemble them, a dab of Plastic Glue on the connector lugs will ensure your models will stay rock solid. Then simply undercoat them using either Skull White or Chaos Black spray. If you're new to miniature painting, don't fret, as there's loads of easy to follow advice and tutorials in this article. You'll also find some solid painting advice, along with most of the colours that you'll need, in the new Assault on Black Reach paint set. The set also contains an extra five Tactical Marines, which you can use to perfect your techniques on.

Top Tip

Find Out More

You'll find lots more tips on painting Citadel miniatures in the aptly named How to Paint Citadel Miniatures book. For Space Marines players in particular, the companion volume, How to Paint Space Marines, is an essential reference guide to painting the Emperor's finest warriors.

Each month the Painting Workshop series builds into an invaluable resource of techniques, tips and tutorials. This issue we look at painting the models from Assault on Black Reach.
ULTRAMARINES TACTICAL SQUAD

You'll find Tactical Squads at the core of most Space Marine forces and you get a full ten-man squad in Black Reach. When assembling them, remove the components from the plastic frame, being careful not to cut off the connector lugs. Use a hobby knife to scrape off any mould lines, and then stick the components together with Plastic Glue. Chad Mierzwa shows us how to get the Space Marines fit for action.

1. Start by undercoating your Space Marine with Chaos Black. Next, paint the armour with a layer of Mortian Blue and the gun with Boltgun Metal.

2. Use Shining Gold to paint the shoulder pad rims and insignia, and Blood Red to paint the eyes.

3. You can add highlights to models using lighter colours — on the armour using Ultramarines Blue and on the Boltgun with Mithril Silver. A finished Tactical Marine, ready to face the Orks at Black Reach.

COMPANY MARKINGS

The Ultramarines shown throughout this article are from the famous 2nd Company, led by Captain Sicarius. There are ten companies in a Space Marine Chapter, and these are denoted by the colour of a Space Marine's shoulder pad rims.

SPACE MARINE TRANSFERS

You'll find a brand new transfer sheet in the Assault on Black Reach game. Waterslide transfers are really useful for adding heraldry and squad markings to your miniatures.

Chapter Markings
In case you don't want to paint your Space Marines as Ultramarines, there are three other Chapter badges on the sheet.

Campaign Markings
These mark your army out as participating in an ongoing campaign.

Squad Markings
Use these to indicate whether your Tactical Marine is the first or second squad of the company.

'easy metal' Showcase

Space Marines of the Salamanders Chapter are implacable in attack and immovable in defence.

The Crimson Fists Chapter hold the Orks as their most bitter enemies.

The White Scars are raiders without peer, masters of hit-and-run warfare.
ULTRAMARINES TERMINATORS

As well as the Terminator you get with this issue (which no doubt you’ll have already assembled) there’s a further five of these Space Marine veterans in Black Reach. Just like the Tactical Squad, they are easy to assemble and will be ready for painting in no time. The Terminators require a very similar palette to the other Ultramarines, and so they were undercoated with Chaos Black as before.

Step 1. Paint the armour with a flat, even coat of Mordian Blue. Paint all of the metallic areas with Boltgun Metal, before painting the weapon casing with Chaos Black. Carefully dot in the eyes with Red Gore. Finally, paint the raised details with a flat coat of Shadow Grey.

Step 2. The whole model can be shaded with a wash of Badab Black. The Terminator’s helmet is then given a coat of Shadow Grey.

Step 3. Apply an edge highlight to the armour with a 1:1 mix of Mordian Blue and Space Wolves Grey. The helmet and raised areas are layered with Fortress Grey. Highlight the metal areas with a coat of Chainmail.

Apply Skull White as the last layer for the helmet and as a fine highlight for the raised details, such as the chest plate and Crux Terminatus icon on the left shoulder.

ADDITIONAL DETAILS

A steady hand, a fine brush paint and Skull White paint were used to add script onto the Terminator armour in certain areas, like the power fist.

The Purity Seal was painted with Bleached Bone on the parchment area, followed by a Gryphonne Sepia Wash. The seal itself was painted Blood Red and highlighted with Blazing Orange.

Top Tip

Spare Parts

The new Terminators are completely compatible with your existing Space Marine plastics. Here, Matt Hutson has used a spare cyclone missile launcher and chest plate from his bitz box and, with a bit of work, mounted it to a Black Reach Terminator.

ULTRAMARINES DREADNOUGHT

The Dreadnought looks and acts like an even larger version of a Space Marine Terminator. As such you can use the painting method described in the stage-by-stage above and apply it to the ancient Space Marine veteran. In particular, the metal areas (see inset) can be painted in the same way as the Terminator’s storm bolter. The transfer sheet also has some useful badges and insignia that can be placed onto the Dreadnought. We’ll be covering how to apply transfers in next month’s Citadel Hobby Essentials.
GOFF ORK BOYZ

Orc Boyz work best in large numbers, as they excel in combat but wear very little armour – the more Boyz you have, the more likely they are to get up close and personal before getting shot!

Assault on Black Reach provides you with 20 Boyz. They're easy to assemble – simply attach the head and slugga arm in the desired position and then undercoat them Chaos Black.

Step 1. As with the Space Marines, use Chaos Black to undercoat your Orc. Paint the weapons Bolgyn Metal and the skin Orkhide Shade. Use Scorched Brown for the straps.

Step 2. Layer the skin with Goblin Green, leaving the Orkhide Shade visible in the recesses. Pick out the teeth and nails with Bleached Bone.

Step 3. You can then highlight the Orc's skin with a 1:1 mix of Goblin Green and Bleached Bone. Highlight the metal areas, such as the choppa and slugga with Chainmail.

All these models were based the same way. Stick sand to the top surface with PVA glue, then paint it Khemri Brown, before drybrushing it with Bleached Bone.

GOFF ORK SYMBOLS

Goff armies rely heavily on foot-sloggers, and their clan emblem is a bull's head. Goffs often sport black-and-white checks and "dags" for decoration, occasionally wearing red as a contrasting colour.

Check Patterns

Goffs love to decorate their wargear with checks. It's surprisingly easy to achieve a checked pattern, just follow these two stages:

1. To paint checks, first draw a grid on the surface you wish to paint.

2. Next, fill in alternate checks with a steady hand.

ORK TRANSFERS

The transfer sheet included in the box caters for the Orks as much as it does the Space Marines. These can be placed on weapons, armour and shoulder plates.

Ruthless and dangerous

Clan Glyphs

If you want to paint your Orks as a clan other than Goffs, then the transfers will come in handy; the white ones look good against stark backgrounds, and vice versa.

Lightning fast Bad moon Orks Evil Sunz Orks Goff Orks

EASY METAL Showcase

Orks of the Evil Sunz clan are irresistibly drawn to fast vehicles and raucous noise.

The Bad Moons are the wealthiest of Orc clans. They have the hardiest armour and the choicest guns.

Snakebites are staunch followers of the old ways, tough as old boots and 'ard as nails.
GOFF ORK NOBZ

The Ork Nob is the other free miniature that came with this issue of White Dwarf, and you get five of these brutes in the Black Reach box. When you assemble the Nob – or indeed any of the push-fit miniatures – it’s always worth taking a minute or two to try out a few positions, such as tilting the head or raising or lowering the weapon. This will give each of your models a different posture.

Step 1. Paint the Nob’s skin with Orkhide Shade. All the metal areas were painted Boltgun Metal. The Ork’s hair and cloth used a 3:1 mix of Codex Grey and Chaos Black. The large tasks can be painted with Iyanden Darksun.

Step 2. Layer the skin with Knarkoc Green, before giving the model a wash of Badab Black. Pick out the teeth with Bleached Bone, before highlighting the top-knot and black cloth with Codex Grey.

Step 3. Give the flesh a wash of Thraka Green, followed by a highlight of Goblin Greens. We used Mithril Silver for highlighting the metal areas. Give the tasks a final highlight of Skull White.

After the top-knot and cloth have had a fine edge highlight of Fortress Grey, the Nob is ready to take on all-comers!

ADDITIONAL DETAILS

The leather areas were first given a basecoat of Scorched Brown. This was followed by Bestial Brown, a wash of Gryphine Sepia and then a highlight of Snakebite Leather.

The spare slugga shells (and the armo drum) started with a base of Shining Gold. A wash of Gryphine Sepia was then applied, followed by Burnished Gold and a final highlight of Mithril Silver.

Technique

Scratched and Damaged Armour

Orks don’t keep their gear in good condition, and many painters like to paint a battle-worn, scratched effect onto Ork wargear. Use a fine brush point and a small amount of Mithril Silver to paint your scratches on – for a more realistic effect, concentrate on the edges that are most likely to suffer from wear and tear.

ORK DEFFKOPTA

The Deffkoptas have been painted in mostly black and metallic colours. Boltgun Metal followed by a Badab Black wash, and then a highlight of either Chainmail or Mithril Silver (or even both) is always an effective method for painting metal. On a large Ork model like this, the battle-damaged effect described above works particularly well, and has been applied to most of the armour plates.

There are many Dreadlords who owe their positions of power to their bloodlines, cruel and dashing exploits, or favour at Malekith's court. Others are granted temporary power by means of a writ of iron, granted by one of the rulers of the great cities of Naggaroth.

A writ of iron grants the Dreadlord power and influence equal to that of his sponsor. However, should the Dreadlord fail in his appointed task, the writ is melted down and the molten remains poured down the noble's throat. Such is the price of failure in Naggaroth.

Mike Anderson's brilliant Dreadlord, mounted on Jes Goodwin's new-look Cold One, perfectly encapsulates the menace and power of a Dark Elf Noble. This meant it was a perfect candidate for a Masterclass. Once again, 'Easy Metal' veteran Neil Green volunteered to masterfully paint this beautiful miniature.

Neil started by meticulously cleaning up all the metal components, before gluing them together with superglue. The fine joins were filled with green stuff and then filed down smooth when dry. The whole model was then undercoated Chaos Black.

Cold One Skin and Scales

It's always good to plan out your colour palette before you get started. For the Cold One, Neil wanted to use a palette of cold colours similar to the other Dark Elf Cold Ones, as a direct contrast to the warm reds that have been used for the Cold One mounts in the Lizardmen range.

Bearing that in mind, Neil went for a cool blue colour for the scales and then a complementary green for the creature's skin. When he was painting the skin, Neil thought the green was becoming too warm and so added Space Wolf Grey to the mix, as described in Step 3 below.

Painting the Skin

1. For the Cold One's skin tones, Neil started with a basecoat of Crafty Shade followed by a layer of Catachan Green.

2. A 1:1 mix of Catachan Green and Camo Green was applied as a mid-tone. More Camo Green was added to the mix for the next layer.

3. A highlight of Camo Green was then applied, followed by an even finer highlight using a 1:3 mix of Camo Green and Space Wolves Grey.

4. The skin was given a wash of Asumen Blue, and a final 1:3 highlight mix of Camo Green and Space Wolves Grey was applied to the most prominent areas.

Painting the Scales

1. The scales were given a basecoat of Regal Blue. An initial 1:1 highlight mix of Regal Blue and Rotting Flesh was applied to the edges of each of the scales.

2. A further highlight layer was applied, adding a bit more Rotting Flesh to the mix before painting it onto the edges of the scales once more.

3. A wash of Asumen Blue and Thraka Green was applied all over the scales. The highlight mix was then reapplied, followed by a wash of Thraka Green.

Other Scale Colours

The 'Eavy Metal team have also painted some Dark Elf Cold Ones in ruddy dark greens, highlighting them with white and yellow.
Dark blues and deep purples have been associated with every incarnation of Dark Elves we’ve produced over the years. Traditionally, purple is also linked with nobility because it was an expensive dye that only the rich could afford. So, for the Dreadlord, Neil wanted it to be the prominent colour. It also contrasts well against the cool blue and green of the Cold One. To get a rich, deep purple, Neil used a base of Liche Purple with a shade mixed from Chaos Black and Liche Purple.

The shield was painted using the same method as the purple cloth, although Neil added far starker highlighting to the sharp edges of the shield.

Purple Cloth

1. The cloth was given a basecoat of Liche Purple. A 1:1 mix of Liche Purple and Chaos Black was then painted into the recessed areas.

2. An initial highlight using a 2:1:1 mix of Liche Purple, Warlock Purple and Bleached Bone was painted onto all but the deepest recesses.

3. Three further highlights were added, each time with a bit more Bleached Bone in the mix. A wash of a 2:1:1 mix of Liche Purple, Warlock Purple and Chaos Black was then applied to the whole area.

4. For the final stage, the raised areas of the cloth were once again highlighted, this time with a 1:1:2 mix of Liche Purple, Warlock Purple and Bleached Bone.

Painting Skin

1. A basecoat of pure Vermillion Brown was painted on, followed by a 1:1 mix of Vermillion Brown and Dwarf Flesh.

2. A layer of Dwarf Flesh was then brushed on to the raised areas of the face, followed by a 3:1 mix of Dwarf Flesh and Bleached Bone.

3. A highlight of a 1:1 mix of Dwarf Flesh and Bleached Bone was then used. A further highlight was applied, adding a little Skull White to the mix.

4. The eyes were painted with Scorched Brown and “dotted” with Bleached Bone. The face was shaded with watered down Scorched Brown.
Painting Metal

Another example of planning out your colours before you begin painting can be seen on the Cold One. Both silver and gold were used on the armour to highlight the fact that this Cold One was a Dreadlord's mount. The Cold One's armoured helm, the champron, was painted gold to suggest a crown, further defining the mount as one of the largest and most vicious examples of the species. The chainmail on both the Dreadlord's legs and the Cold One's barding was edged with gold. On the Dreadlord himself, gold banding was used on his armour, again to mark him out as a character and make him stand out when placed in the ranks of the Cold One Knights.

Painting Steel

1. Neil started by painting a basecoat of Bolgul Metal all over the metal areas.

2. Next he shaded the metal with a thinned-down 1:1 mix of Chaos Black and Codex Grey. The Bolgul Metal was reapplied, followed by a highlight of Chainmail.

3. A wash of Devlan Mud was added next. When this was dry, the areas were washed again with Badab Black. Finally, the raised areas and edges were highlighted with Mithril Silver.

Painting Gold

1. A 1:1 mix of Shining Gold and Scorched Brown was used as a basecolour. When dry, Neil washed the area with watered-down Scorched Brown.

2. Shining Gold was brushed on over the basecoat, followed by a highlight using a 1:1 mix of Shining Gold and Mithril Silver.

3. A wash of Devlan Mud was then applied, before a final wash of Gryphonse Sepia was used to finish off the gold effect.

Gold Inlay

'Eavy Metal's Joe Tomaszewski took a different approach to the armour of his Dreadlord, and gave the model a really ostentatious look by using a gold inlay. First he painted the metal areas silver, and then he marked off the gold areas with Chaos Black. These were then painted with the gold method used by Neil. The silver areas were then re-highlighted where they met the gold banding.
The shield design was painted by Neil in freehand. It does take a bit of practice to be able to paint glyphs, sigils and other race markings with just a brush and a steady hand, but even the guys in 'Eavy Metal don’t always get it right on their first attempt. To start with it’s always best to draw your design on a piece of paper and then copy it. Don’t make it up on the fly – it rarely works! Spacing and size are also very important; use dots to mark prominent points or some other visual cue to make sure your design fits into the space. Take your time and draw the basic shape, even if it’s quite rough at first. The joy of painting means you can always cover up any mistakes and refine your design.

Painting Black

1. Step 1: Starting with a Chaos Black basecoat, Neil highlighted it with a 1:1 mix of Chaos Black and Codex Grey, and then applied a further highlight of Codex Grey.

2. Step 2: A further highlight of Fortress Grey was then lightly applied, before being shaded with a wash of Badab Black.

3. Step 3: When dry, Neil reapplied Fortress Grey highlights. A final highlight of a 1:1 mix of Fortress Grey and Skull White was then added to the most raised areas.

Painting the Shield Rune

1. Step 1: Once Neil had finalised a design, he copied it very carefully onto the surface of the shield with Vomit Green.

2. Step 2: Bleached Bone was used to create a fine keyline around the edge of the design.

3. Step 3: Neil then carefully tidied up the design using Skull White and Liche Purple to further define and awaken up the image.

Battle Standard

Joe converted his Dreadlord into a Battle Standard Bearer with a simple weapon swap for the standard. As you can see from the picture above, the banner itself features an icon designed by Joe and painted on freehand. For Joe it was important that the design was placed in the middle of the banner, so he carefully plotted the centre and extreme points of the icon before he actually started painting it.
Final Details

To finish the model Neil picked out the smaller details, such as the Cold One's eye, the rune at the base of the sword blade and the skulls.

While it's tempting to rush through these last few bits, you should always spend plenty of time on them to make sure the whole model comes together.

The eye was painted using a mix of Vomit Brown and Bleached Bone. A black slit was carefully painted in the centre of the eye.

The skulls were first painted using Graveyard Earth, then a 1:1 mix of Graveyard Earth and Bleached Bone, followed by a Skull White highlight.

The teeth and claws were given a basecoat of Vomit Brown, followed by a midtone of Bleached Bone and a highlight of Skull White.

The icon on the Cold One's skull was carefully painted using a 1:3 mix of Regal Blue and Chaos Black.
Continuing the huge success of last year’s inaugural Polish Golden Demon painting competition, this year sees the event go from strength to strength, and move to a new venue as well.

After the huge success of last year’s Polish Golden Demon, 2008 continues to see the biggest miniatures painting competition in Poland grow in size and popularity as it finds its rightful place alongside its sister Games Workshop Golden Demon events.

A NEW VENUE
This year, this most prestigious of painting competitions will be held at the Poznan Game Arena in conjunction with the Poznan International Fair – a unique multimedia and entertainment trade fair that attracts computer gamers, party game enthusiasts and fans of extreme sports. Last year alone, over 17,000 entertainment and hobby enthusiasts from all across Europe visited the event, so you can be sure the arrival of Golden Demon will cause quite a stir.

GOLDEN DEMON AND MORE
As well as the painting competition itself, there will also be the infamous Scrap Demon convention competition in which you can let your modelling skills run riot, as well as introductions to painting and gaming, not to mention a sneak presentation of many of our forthcoming new releases. Finally, we’ll have special guest personalities from the Design Studio who will be on hand to answer all your questions about the hobby.

Check the official Polish Golden Demon website for all the latest updates and announcements as they happen.
